

King Fahd marks 14 years on throne

DUBAI (R) — King Fahd marks 14 years on the Middle East's richest throne on Thursday at a time of unprecedented speculation about the future of Saudi Arabia.

Saudi television regularly shows the 75-year-old monarch presiding over the weekly cabinet meeting in his capacity as prime minister, or receiving princes and other dignitaries.

On Saturday, he went to the airport at Jeddah, the country's second city on the Red Sea coast where the temperature at this time of year exceeds 40 degrees Celsius (104 Fahrenheit), to greet the Sultan of Oman, Qaboos Ben Said.

State television showed the king smiling and shaking hands with the sultan and Omani officials on the scorching tarmac.

On Monday he was shown at the evening cabinet in Jeddah, which he is known to prefer to the capital, Riyadh.

The footage of him gesturing and engaging his ministers in conversation belied Western media reports that he is fading after his stroke in November and is on the brink of abdication.

Although he suffers from diabetes and leans on a stout walking stick to relieve discomfort from an arthritic knee, King Fahd invariably appears animated and in full command. His deep black moustache and goatee beard betray no hint of grey.

U.S. Magazine Time said last month the king was suffering from dementia and might soon leave the country permanently, delegating power to his half-brother and heir apparent, Crown Prince Abdullah.

King Fahd handed over the affairs of state temporarily to Abdullah at the beginning of the year but reassumed command seven weeks later. The Washington Post reported last month that he suffered bouts of confusion and disorientation and, for all practical purposes, the mantle of power had already passed to Prince Abdullah.

The commander-in-chief of the U.S. Central Command, General Binford Peay, had earlier told Jane's Defence Weekly that the general feeling was that King Fahd would go off to Spain or somewhere in Europe for a while and Abdullah would take over.

The King has a palace in the resort of Marbella in southern Spain. The times of London on Saturday quoted sources close to the Spanish government in Madrid as saying King Fahd may shortly step down and retire in Marbella.

Authorities in the conservative Gulf kingdom have not commented officially on the reports.

"The mechanism for him to slip away indefinitely is in place and if he doesn't do that something's wrong," said a Middle East analyst with close connections to the kingdom.

"Something's wrong because he's being forced to stay in place, against what is good for him and good for the kingdom."

King Fahd acceded to the Saudi throne on June 13, 1982 on the death of his half-brother King Khalid.

Since then he has presided over the investment of billions of dollars in oil revenue in modernising the state.

Saudi Arabia, as the world's largest oil producer and exporter has sufficient reserves to last more than a century and is the dominant member of the oil exporters OPEC.

At the OPEC 100th meeting in Vienna last week the thorny issue of Iraq's return to world oil markets for the first time since its 1990 invasion of Kuwait was handled adroitly and ultimately on Saudi terms.

Speculation about succession in the tightly-controlled kingdom is watched keenly by world markets and oil prices have reacted to reports on the state of the king's health. Saudi Arabia's vast oil wealth gives it unique political clout in world councils ranging from the United Nations to the six-member Gulf Cooperation Council, where other Gulf Arabs defer to Riyadh as "big brother."

The king is a firm supporter of Middle East peace talks and at Monday night's cabinet called for intensified efforts to resume discussions between Israel and its Arab neighbours, the official Saudi press agency reported.

France urges Iran to move against terrorism

DOHA (R) — France's foreign minister on Tuesday said Iran must respect the principle of non-interference in the affairs of other states and cooperate in the fight against international terrorism.

"I sincerely believe that Iran must respect the principle of non-interference and contribute to peace and security of the area," Herve de Charette told a news conference.

He also urged Iran to "cooperate with the international community in its move against terrorism."

Mr. De Charette's remarks came a week after Bahrain said it had foiled an Iranian-backed plot to topple its government by force and install a fundamentalist Islamic regime.

Iran denied the accusations and has said it wants improved relations with Gulf Arab states.

The United States has accused Iran of sponsoring international terrorism and Gulf Arab states have urged Tehran to stop "interfering" in the affairs of other countries.

Iran, a regional power, has dismissed the charges.

Mr. De Charette arrived in Qatar on Monday on a three-day Gulf tour which he said would cover questions of security, Middle East peace, measures against terrorism and increased economic and military cooperation with Gulf Arab states.

Paris is also seeking lucrative defence contracts in the oil-rich but militarily vulnerable region.

France is a major supplier of fighter planes to the Qatar's air force. Next year, France's Dassault aviation is expected to replace the country's ageing Mirage fighters with 12 updated models of Mirage 2000-5s, diplomats said.

France also wants to sell battle tanks to Qatar's army.

Mr. De Charette said France was seeking greater cooperation with Qatar in the fields of oil and gas, industry and the military.

British Week offers business, cultural experience

By a Jordan Times Staff Reporter

AMMAN — A commercial and cultural extravaganza highlighting opportunities of doing business with Britain as well as the lighter side of British culture is in the offing in Amman next week, the British ambassador to Jordan announced Wednesday.

The so-called British Week in Amman is being held to mark 50 years of the "modern" relationship between the United Kingdom and Jordan, said Ambassador Peter Hinchcliffe, recalling that the first British ambassador to Jordan took office on June 22, 1946 when he presented his credentials to King Abdullah, the late founder of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

The British Week is being held under the patronage of His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan on whose behalf Her Royal Highness Princess Sumaya will inaugurate the event on Friday.

Ambassador Hinchcliffe said the British Week — June 14-21 — will have two aspects — the commercial dimension which will feature an exhibition of products and catalogues of 117 British companies, all of them seeking agency and representation arrangements in Jordan.

The participating companies will represent the "four components" of the United Kingdom — England, Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales — and include manufacturers of clothing and knitwear, giftware and pottery, perfumes and toiletries, food and drinks, furniture, fabrics, toys, antiques, stationery and sports equipment.

"It is an important opportunity for Jordanians wishing to do business with the United Kingdom" to establish contacts with British companies, said the ambassador.

The commercial exhibition will open on June 16 and will remain in place through June 19 at the Forte Grand Hotel, the venue for all the events scheduled in the British Week.

Britain is among the top six or seven exporters to Jordan, with an annual sales of products worth JD 131 million in 1995, Jordan's exports to the United Kingdom were worth JD 23 million in the same year, said the ambassador.

The second dimension of the British Week — "the first of its kind to be held in the Arab World" — said Mr. Hinchcliffe, is British culture, with a particular emphasis on the "lighter side" — comedies, music, magic shows and an exhibition of the original works of the Oriental painter David Roberts. The exhibition will be opened by Princess Wijdan.

Among the events featured are "the best of West Musicals," the British Airways Theatre's play, "Bedside Manners," the "Mop-Top Beatles in concert," a magic show by Alan Shaxon, the "Hiss and Boo Theatre" — where the audience because part of the show — the Caspian String Quartet, One Man Band and Close-up Magic, and Noel Coward Cabaret.

"Bedside Manners" stars John Inman, who is very familiar to Jordanian television viewers for his role in the comedy series "Are You Being Served?"

Capping the week is an exhibition of a replica "crown jewels" collection. The original collection, owned by the British royal family, is at the Tower of London. An original "Beefeater" on loan to the British Week in Jordan.

The Carl Stinson duo and Gary Williams will perform at the Forte Grand Hotel during the entire duration of the British Week.

Ambassador Hinchcliffe said the British Week in Amman was the first of its kind in the Arab World in that it was the first time commercial and cultural dimensions of Britain were being brought together.

He described it as "the most appropriate way to celebrate the modern relationship" between Jordan and the U.K.

Jordan is holding a similar event in London, with most of the emphasis on the commercial side of the relationship, highlighting the Kingdom's potential for exports as part of a bilateral programme of cooperation.

The British Week in Amman is organised by the British Department of Trade and Industry, the Commercial Section of the British embassy in Amman, the British Council, British Airways and the Forte Grand Hotel in Amman.

Sponsors include the ANZ Grindlays Bank, The British Bank of the Middle East, Royal Doulton, Johnnie Walker, ICI Dulux Paints, Rover Cars, Land Rover, Fasha, Najla International, Vayley Cosmetics, Twinings Tea and British Education Abroad.

Group demands resignation of U.S. official in Libyan money laundering

WASHINGTON (AP) — A group representing relatives of victims in the Pan Am 103 bombing called Tuesday for the resignation of a top treasury official whose office compromised a criminal investigation into Libyan money laundering.

The group called Justice for Pan Am 103 charged that the actions of Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) Director R. Richard Newcomb in the 1994 criminal case fit a pattern in the Clinton administration of "talking tough" about Libya but "doing nothing."

"This information about Newcomb's activities has apparently been around for a long time now, and up to now the administration has chosen to do nothing. This inaction must end now," group spokeswoman Susan Cohen said.

Mrs. Cohen's 20-year-old son Theodore, a Syracuse University student, died in the 1988 bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed all 259 people on the plane and 11 on the ground. The Clinton administration did not have any immediate comment.

The group was reacting to an Associated Press story detailing how the probe into Libyan money laundering was compromised by disclosures of sensitive information from Mr. Newcomb's agency, OFAC's actions angered the other participating law enforcement agencies, the documents obtained by AP show.

The lead Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) agent told a recent treasury inquiry into the botched 1994 case that she was "professionally and personally appalled" by uncoordinated disclosures of information from Mr. Newcomb's agency.

The chief of the Justice Department's money laundering section told the same internal inquiry that OFAC "had no business" disclosing the sensitive information.

Documents show even Mr. Newcomb's own criminal investigators were caught off guard by his actions, and objected to them.

Shortly after President Bill Clinton pledged to crack down on Libya, the U.S. government began an investigation into allegations that visa cheques from Libya were being laundered through a New York bank in violation of the Libyan economic embargo.

Key to the investigation, according to the documents, was a confidential informant in the London banking community. The United States also obtained the assistance of the British secret intelligence service.

The breaches occurred shortly after Mr. Newcomb, whose treasury office is charged with enforcing trade embargoes, demanded to see information from the confidential informant so he could brief foreign banking officials, the documents show.

OFAC agents strongly objected to disclosing the case file's contents "because the specific information would in and of itself identify" the informant, according to a memo summarising the agents' recent interviews with congressional investigators.

10 Turkish policemen face trial on charges of torture

ISTANBUL (R) — A Turkish court charged 10 policemen on Tuesday for the torture of a group of mostly teenage students in the southern town of Manisa, a member of parliament following the case said in a statement.

"Despite the pressures by the authorities and their schemes and attempts to cover up, the torturers have been identified — Manisa criminal court has begun proceedings against 10 torturers, with demands for 70 years in jail for each," Sabri Ergul, Social-Democrat deputy, said in a written statement.

The trial will begin on June 24, Mr. Ergul said. But Mr. Ergul, who has closely tracked the case since the first claims of torture earlier this year, was sceptical that those facing trial bore full responsibility.

"The police chiefs, who are the head torturers, are hiding while they throw those under their command into the fire," he said. "But this is proof that torturers can be tried... In spite of everything."

The indictment says doctors' reports, the statements of the victims and sworn statements by witnesses pointed to "illegal acts and the use of force" by the policemen against 16 detainees in their efforts to extract confessions. The 14 victims — males and females aged between 14 and the early 20s — have said they were stripped naked, anally raped with batons, given electric shocks, hosed with pressurised water and beaten.

Their lawyer Pelin Erda has said some had to be taken to hospital with internal bleeding and psychological problems.

The publicity surrounding the case led to a rare admission from the outgoing justice minister in February that some members of the security forces were guilty of torture.

Turkey has long been under fire by its Western allies, as well as human rights activists and lawyers, for the alleged police torture of detainees.

The 16 have been on trial since March 12 for alleged far-left activities.

Saudi Arabia wants Internet to promote Islam

RIYADH (AFP) — Saudi Arabia is eager to join the Internet to boost business and promote Islam but it is still debating how to prevent pornography and political opposition manifestos from flooding into the kingdom.

"Imagine in the African jungle, in Europe, America, and even in Alaska people could learn a lot of things about Islam, Arab history and the Saudi economy," said Ihsan Abu Haliqa, a university professor in Saudi Arabia.

"A journalist in the United

Regent stresses need to offer special training for Badia Forces

AMMAN (Petra)— His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent, said during a visit to the Badia and Border Police headquarters in Amman Wednesday that Badia police officers ought to be accorded specialised training relevant to the tribal traditions in the Kingdom so that they would be in a better position to handle problems in the Badia region.

Speaking at a meeting with the force's commander Brigadier Thaher Al Fawaz and the Director General of the Public Security Department (PSD) Lieutenant General Nasouh Muhiuddin, the Regent praised the role of the Badia troops in carrying out not only security tasks but also in conducting social and humanitarian services in the Badia and border regions of the Kingdom.

He stressed the importance of appropriate and specialised training for the Badia police officers to upgrade their skills in dealing with issues connected with and emanating from the Badia regions and their traditional bedouin residents.

Suggesting that the Badia and Border Police Force coordinate its programmes with the Al al Bayt University, the Regent said that the university can conduct and compile wide-ranging research on bedouin traditions, social systems and means of developing the tribes' economic and social standards and ensuring their security.

He said that the Badia police troops have a duty to keep close to the local tribes and their settlements in order to learn about, and try to solve their problems directly and provide any required help to settlements in remote regions of the country to attain a balance between the bedouin and urban societies of Jordan.

Referring to the animal feed problem which the bedouins often complain from, Prince Hassan urged the tribes to utilise the desert and arid regions of Jordan by growing animal

Seminar urges Arab leaders to place Jerusalem on top of priorities

AMMAN (Petra) — Participants in the annual seminar on Jerusalem on Monday welcomed the convening of an Arab summit to Cairo later this month and urged Arab leaders to reunite their stands to be able to counter challenges facing the Arab Nation.

At the conclusion of the two-day seminar, organised by the General Islamic Congress for Jerusalem in cooperation with the Organisation of the Islamic Conference (OIC) at the King Abdullah Mosque in Amman, the participants called on the Arab leaders who will attend the summit to place the Holy City of Jerusalem at the top of their priorities and help regain Palestinian rights in the city.

Furthermore, the participants who represent Jordan and other Arab and Muslim countries, called for supporting the Palestinians in their final status negotiations with Israel to help them establish their independent state on their national soil, with Jerusalem as its capital.

In the final communiqué issued at the conclusion of the seminar, the participating scholars and intellectuals also asked the OIC to convene a summit of leaders of Muslim countries to discuss the question of Jerusalem in a comprehensive manner.

In addition, they suggested convening an international Islamic popular conference to familiarise the international public opinion with the Jerusalem question and Arab and Islamic rights in the city and stressed the importance of establishing a data bank on Jerusalem to help provide all those concerned with information on the city.

The participants underlined the need for Arab solidarity and called for providing the needed financial support for the Arab residents of Jerusalem in the face of the Israeli properties law which charges high taxes on Palestinian real estate owners and to help them renovate Islamic holy sites in the city.

Senate Speaker Ahmad Lawzi opened the seminar on Tuesday on behalf of His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent.

At the opening ceremony, Mr. Lawzi delivered an address in which he highlighted the Hashemite family's endeavours to save the Holy City and protect its holy shrines.

Jordan, Saudi Arabia open trade talks

AMMAN (Petra)— The Jordanian-Saudi Joint Committee opened a two-day meeting in Amman Wednesday to promote economic ties and increase the volume of trade between Jordan and Saudi Arabia. The two sides are expected to wind up the talks Thursday with the signing of trade agreements.

At the start of the talks, the Saudi Arabian Minister of Trade Usama Faqih told his Jordanian counterpart Ali Abul Ragheb that Saudi Arabia was looking forward to increasing economic relations and the exemption of national products sold in either country from customs duty and the removal of other trade barriers.

Jordanian-Saudi cooperation in this respect stems from a 1962 economic agreement which is being updated to cater to the present day requirements, said Mr. Faqih.

"Last year, the volume of trade between Jordan and Saudi Arabia reached $675 million, but the two countries are looking with optimism towards further increases in the volume of trade," said Mr. Faqih.

"Geographical proximity between the two countries, the land, sea and air transport facilities available to them and the removal of trade barriers are bound to help them expand their cooperation further," added the Saudi minister.

Mr. Abul Ragheb was quoted by Jordan Television as saying: "The meetings mark the start of a new era in relations between the two countries which are expected to witness free flow of capital and goods and further facilities for movement of businessmen and merchants both ways."

He said the exemption of goods from customs duty and other fees is also bound to help boost trade relations.

"Jordan and Saudi Arabia are moving gradually towards economic integration and are coordinating their efforts to achieve that goal first because they are keen on promoting inter-Arab trade and second because the two countries are currently taking steps to organise their economic activities at the international level, joining the World Trade Organisation and assuming partnership with the European Union," said the minister.

The two sides created working groups to discuss transport, telecommunications, culture, information, trade and technical cooperation and these immediately embarked on their tasks.

to prepare a memorandum of understanding for signing Thursday at the end of the joint committee meetings.

Ministry of Industry and trade sources said that the two sides were also focusing on the cooperation of business communities from both countries, facilitating their visits to either country and encouraging them to launch joint ventures.

Jordanian and Saudi Arabia business people last month held separate meetings and agreed to create a joint Jordanian-Saudi company with a $50 million capital as a nucleus for their future cooperation.

Court of Cassation ratifies death sentence

By Rana Hussein
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — The Court of Cassation Wednesday ratified a ruling by the Amman Criminal Court to execute a 39-year-old man for the murder of his secretary in Syria on Oct. 23, 1994, judicial sources said.

The source told the Jordan Times that the five-judge panel which reviewed the case, unanimously ratified the criminal court's ruling.

Mustafa A. H., a merchant, was sentenced to death on Feb. 27, 1996, after he was found guilty of the premeditated murder of his 22-year-old secretary Maysoon Tawfiq in Syria.

According to the prosecution, Ms. Tawfiq was reported missing by her family after she failed to return home or to report to work.

The victim's brother received a tip that his sister might be in Syria, and when he travelled there, he was informed by the Syrian police that his sister was found murdered in a desert area outside the capital, the prosecution said.

Under preliminary questioning, the convict denied any knowledge of Ms. Tawfiq's whereabouts.

But investigations discovered that Jordanian border police records showed both the defendant and the victim travelled to Syria on the same day.

The prosecution said when faced with the evidence, the convict admitted to having an affair with Ms. Tawfiq and that she was pregnant.

The prosecution charged that Mustafa lured Ms. Tawfiq to Damascus on the pretence of marrying her, but with the intent to kill her.

The case will be referred to the chief attorney general, then the minister of justice, the prime minister and finally the King for endorsement of the verdict, the source added.

Meanwhile, the criminal court set June 22 to start trying 12 people, five of them sentenced to death last year, after their case was returned by the Court of Cassation for retrial because of lack of evidence, the judicial source said.

After reviewing the case for nine months, the higher court in March ruled that the criminal court based its sentencing on confessions of the defendants and neglected to study any evidence.

On June 20, 1995 the criminal court handed five death sentences on five of the 12 known as "the Uduwan Mills" for their alleged involvement in five murders and armed robberies in 1989, 1990 and 1991.

Nine of the 12 defendants, including two women, were found guilty by the criminal court of committing a total of 230 crimes, including five murders, theft, attempted murder, possession of automatic weapons, kidnapping and fraud. The remaining three were acquitted by the same court.

JES urges more efforts to fight pollution

AMMAN (Petra)—The Jordan Environment Society (JES) Wednesday urged the Environment Corporation to work out and implement a long-term system to fight pollution.

JES President Ahmad Obeidat told a meeting organised to mark the World Environment Day (WED) that so far Jordan has not given the pollution of air sufficient priority, especially in congested areas where the air is polluted by car exhaust fumes, factories chimneys and other sources.

He said there was need for preparing technical specifications to control the quality of air, a process which requires coordination among the various concerned parties in the public and private sectors.

The creation of an environment corporation recently was a step in the right direction and an essential step towards the implementation of the national strategy on the environment, said Mr. Obeidat.

"The JES calls for further efforts to be made towards the protection of water resources and the recycling of treated water for agricultural purposes," said Mr. Obeidat, who added that the society urges the concerned authorities in Jordan to find waste dumps especially for the dangerous radio active and chemical waste materials away from residential areas so that they would not be a source of pollution.

Minister of Municipal and Rural Affairs and the Environment Abdul Razak Tubeishat outlined Jordan's efforts over the past years to protect the environment with the help of specialised world agencies including the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP).

He said that the recently adopted law on the protection of the environment reflects the Kingdom's commitment to dealing with the dangerous elements of pollution, ensuring appropriate and safe utilisation of energy and natural resources and dealing with the dangers posed to the environment in general.

Environment Corporation Director General Saleh Share said that his office supervises the dumping of solid and other waste materials in various parts of the country and monitors the process of dumping waste.

The corporation has recently focused on ensuring a safe atmosphere for Jordan through monitoring the quality of air, especially in the main cities and industrial estates mainly Amman, Aqaba, Fuhes, Ruseifeh and Al Hashemeh where pollution was found to be high.

Furthermore, the corporation continues to give due attention to and give advice against the use of materials that tend to deplete the ozone layer in cooperation with concerned world organisations.

The world environment day was marked in more than 100 countries around the world to focus global attention on environmental action and awareness.

So far Jordan has not given the pollution of air sufficient priority, especially in congested areas where the air is polluted by car exhaust fumes, etc.

Khleifat pushes to amend CDD law

AMMAN (Petra)— Minister of Interior Awad Khleifat Wednesday criticised the present Civil Defence (CDD) law saying that, in its present form, it does not help the Kingdom's civil defence authorities to cater to the requirements of industrial and economic growth in Jordan.

Speaking at a meeting by the Higher Civil Defence Council (HCDC) attended by Minister of Municipal and Rural Affairs and the Environment Abdul Razak Tubeishat, Dr. Khleifat said that the law, which has been in force since 1959, should be amended to a manner that would enable the CDD to cater to the needs of industry and economic development.

Dr. Khleifat, who is also HCDC chairman, said the country is in need of updated amendments that would close gaps which appeared during the practical application of the law over the past years.

He said also that the most of the powers included in the present law fall under the jurisdiction of the HCDC which does not have a general secretariat to follow up on the implementation of its decisions. In addition, he said, this law restricts the CDD's movements when its services are urgently required.

He also demanded that a general secretariat be created for the council to record and follow up decisions and plans and coordinate the council's work with its sub-branches in the various governorates and with the ministries and various departments as well as prepare a new emergency budget which would be at the disposal of the council's chairman in time of need.

Dr. Khleifat urged the various government and private institutions to cooperate closely with the CDD and the school children, youth clubs and charitable organisations to get training in civil defence work and first aid to help the civil defence authorities with their work.

He said that the council plans to hold another meeting in August in order to review a draft law which the Ministry of Interior is currently preparing to replace the present law.

1 killed, 100 hurt in Bangladesh election

DHAKA (R) — Bangladeshis voted in large numbers in the country's second parliamentary election in four months Wednesday, but the polling was marred by scattered violence that killed one person and injured nearly 100.

Voting closed at 4 p.m. (1000 GMT) and counting of ballots began immediately. Final results from the 300 constituencies were expected by Friday.

Witnesses and poll officials said turnout was heavy and they expected at least 70 per cent of the more than 56 million registered voters to have cast ballots.

Despite the violence, a senior police officer described the incidents as "fewer than feared" and said voting in most of the country was largely peaceful and disciplined.

A smooth election followed by a result that is accepted by the main contenders for power would be an encouraging boost for democracy in a nation that has spent much of its 25 years of independence under military rule.

"We are not apprehensive of violence during voting but we are afraid of violence when the losing party would refuse to accept the results," said a government official.

Among the first to vote in the capital Dhaka was Golam Azam, leader of the right-wing Jamaat-E-Islami party, who cast his ballot in a Bangladesh election for the first time.

"I am delighted to be able to exercise my citizen's right for the first time in independent Bangladesh," he told reporters.

Mr. Azam opposed Bangladesh's 1971 independence from Pakistan and lived abroad until 1987 when he returned and regained his citizenship after a long court battle.

Wednesday's election was called after a vote in February was boycotted by opposition parties led by the Awami League of Sheikh Hasina.

Political analysts expect the race between the BNP and the Awami League to be close.

A third group, the Jatiya (National) Party, led by jailed former President Hossain Mohammad Ershad, is likely to hold the balance in the event of a hung parliament. Foreign election observers monitoring the elections in Bangladesh Wednesday said their preliminary impressions about the polling process were positive.

"We saw no evidence of any kind of malpractice on the basis of our own observations here in the city," said Cayetana De Zulueta, an Italian MP and head of the 29-member European Union Election Commission.

"We had a good impression in the 20 polling stations that we visited," Zulueta told AFP. "There was no tension and (there was) a high turn-out as far as we could tell."

A senior government source said repolling would be held where voting had been stopped because of unruliness or vote rigging.

"My experience was positive," said Colleen Beaumier, a Canadian member of parliament, who visited six polling centres outside Dhaka. "It seemed to be absolutely free and fair in those areas."

"The presence of international observers prevented any problems from occurring. I believe our presence (in Bangladesh) may have diverted anticipated problems," Ms. Beaumier added.

Niaz Naik, a former Pakistani foreign secretary and member of the 40-member non-government South Asian group said: "Everything went peacefully in the Gazipur areas I visited."

"There were no complaints from any side. The elections seemed to be free, fair and festive," Mr. Naik said.

About 160 foreign observers monitored the elections here, joined by about 100 Dhaka-based diplomats and 3,000 local observers.

All observer groups are expected to make formal statements Thursday. Many of them will travel overnight to the capital from far-flung areas.

A European diplomat, who visited four polling centres here, said the polling was very organised and we witnessed no problems.

Many observers said they were impressed by the large number of women voters.

Clinton unhurt after plane hits heavy turbulence

ON BOARD AIR FORCE ONE (R) — President Bill Clinton's plane hit severe turbulence over Texas Tuesday, sending people flying out of their seats, smashing dishes and splattering food on the walls.

Mr. Clinton, who was sitting in an armchair and reading in his office on board Air Force One, was not hurt during the incident, which occurred near Lubbock, Texas, said White House spokesman Mike McCurry.

Only one person was injured on the flight from Albuquerque, New Mexico to Charleston, South Carolina — a Secret Service agent who cut his hand slightly.

Dressed in denim jeans and a long-sleeved T-shirt, Mr. Clinton walked through the plane shortly after the turbulence, which was caused by flying near electrical storms in the area, to check on the 46 passengers and 26 crew members on board.

"It was certainly a character builder, wasn't it?" Mr. Clinton said to reporters on the plane. "I was holding on, I was holding on," he added, laughing.

The turbulence lifted people at the back of the plane up to three feet (one metre) out of their seats and sent dishes smashing against the walls of the plane, a specially equipped Boeing 747.

The Secret Service agents appeared to suffer most from the turbulence, which sent food flying through their cabin and onto their clothes.

Mr. Clinton was seated in an armchair without his seatbelt buckled when the first jolt hit, Mr. McCurry said. He quickly belted himself in before the second jolt, which was strong enough to throw one person out of his seat and into the ceiling.

"(Clinton) was safely in his seat and he was reading at the time. He didn't get thrown out," Mr. McCurry said, adding that the president had not yet been served anything to eat or drink.

Many people on the plane were shaken up by the turbulence, which is unusual on Air Force One, but Mr. McCurry, who was with the president when it occurred, appeared unruffled.

"I was sitting in there with my drink and managed to catch it when it came back down," the spokesman said. "The last time I saw that was in a Bugs Bunny cartoon."

Dole appears to rule out Powell as running mate

WASHINGTON (R) — Presumptive Republican presidential candidate Bob Dole all but ruled out retired Gen. Colin Powell as his running mate Tuesday in November's U.S. Presidential election, but said the former head of the military Joint Chiefs of Staff could play a foreign policy role in a Dole administration.

"I think General Powell meant it when he said he is not interested in elective office in 1996," Sen. Dole said in an interview taped for the ABC programme, Nightline.

Gen. Powell has repeatedly said he would not run this year but some Republicans had thought it might be an offer he could not refuse if Sen. Dole asked him to be his vice presidential candidate.

"I think Colin Powell, if I'm any judge, meant what he said at his press conference this year. He took a look at the presidency, he thought about it, he pondered, he studied and he decided no way, no elective office in 1996," Sen. Dole said.

Asked if he would like to see Gen. Powell in his administration, Sen. Dole replied "well yes. The answer is yes. I certainly would and I'm very proud that he's a Republican."

Sen. Dole, who quit his Senate post Tuesday to focus on the campaign for the November election, agreed that Gen. Powell's foreign policy and military experience would qualify him for the job of secretary of state or defence.

"I mean, words of experience, that would bring instant credibility to any administration," Sen. Dole told ABC.

Meanwhile, influential Republican right-wingers vowed Tuesday to fight Sen. Dole's conciliatory new gesture toward abortion-rights advocates and said his move could provoke a bruising battle at the Republican convention.

The prospective Republican presidential nominee sparked a furor Monday by saying he wants a "declaration of tolerance" for those who support abortion rights added to a longstanding statement opposing abortion in the party's campaign platform.

"I think I make that decision. It's not negotiable ... and it is going to be in the plank. It's probably going to be in the abortion plank," Sen. Dole said in an interview with CNN.

"It seems to me you want to make it clear to the people out there that we are tolerant. This is a moral issue. It is not like all the other things in the platform and it ought to be right up there where people can see it," he said.

This stand, which seemed to catch even Sen. Dole's supporters and advisers by surprise, went well beyond his previous call for tolerance on the issue in the interest of party unity.

Most hardline anti-abortion Republican leaders had grudgingly accepted that stand since it was general in nature.

But the new comment clearly upset that delicate balance.

Pat Buchanan, an uncompromising abortion foe who finished second to Sen. Dole in the primaries, indicated he will oppose him on this at the Aug. 12-15 convention that will formally award Sen. Dole the Republican presidential nomination.

Mr. Buchanan, like other Republican conservatives, had supported Sen. Dole's original "declaration of tolerance" so long as it went only into the general preamble of the platform and thus applied to all issues, not just abortion.

"A declaration of tolerance for the idea that a woman has a right to choose whether to destroy her unborn child in the womb entails the negation, and destruction of, our party's pro-life stand," Mr. Buchanan said in a statement Tuesday.

"Any such declaration of moral equivalence between pro-life and pro-abortion will be resisted at San Diego with all the resources at our command," he said.

A source close to Mr. Buchanan said "the abortion fallout from Dole may lead Pat Buchanan to go third-party," meaning he might launch a divisive independent presidential campaign.

As a measure of the potential conflict, Representative Henry Hyde — an Illinois Republican, Dole ally and chairman of the convention's platform committee — said he wants the tolerance position in the preamble, not as part of the anti-abortion plank as Sen. Dole had said.

On Tuesday Sen. Dole said goodbye to the U.S. Senate with a lump in his throat Tuesday, ending a 35-year congressional career with fond reminiscences, flashes of wit and a struggle with his emotions.

Sen. Dole resigned effective at 2 p.m. EDT to devote full time to his uphill presidential campaign against Bill Clinton, and he stood to speak for the last time as the longest-serving Republican leader — 11 years — in Senate history.

Addressing a packed chamber after members of both parties had extolled his virtues and his record, his voice faltered as he called up memories.

"The Bible tells us, 'to every thing there's a season', and I think my season in the Senate is about to come to an end," he said with difficulty on one of those occasions.

"But the new season before me makes this moment far less the closing of one chapter than the opening of another."

In Glendale, California, Mr. Clinton asked an audience of students to applaud Sen. Dole.

"I would like to ask all of you, including those of you who are my supporters, to just take a moment and wish him well," the president said.

Republican presidential candidate Bob Dole and his wife Elizabeth leave the U.S. Capitol Tuesday. Dispute over Cousteau name is settled

SAN FRANCISCO (R) — Famed French oceanographer Jacques Cousteau and an organisation he founded said Tuesday they had settled a legal dispute with his son over the use of the Cousteau name on a Fiji Islands resort. The 85-year-old explorer and the Cousteau Society, a non-profit environmental group, sued Jean-Michel Cousteau and his business partner in September 1995 claiming trademark infringement and unfair business practices in their use of the Cousteau name to advertise the resort. As part of the settlement, Jean-Michel Cousteau and business partners agreed to add Jean-Michel's first name to the resort to avoid confusion.

Dudley Moore sues to divorce 4th wife

LOS ANGELES (R) — Actor and comedian Dudley Moore Tuesday filed for divorce from his fourth wife — the woman he allegedly abused a month before their wedding. British-born Moore, 61, who has been married three times previously, cited "irreconcilable differences" for the breakup of his marriage to Nicole Rothschild, 29 years his junior. The petition, filed in Los Angeles Superior Court, said the couple, who married on April 16, 1994, had been separated since May 27 this year. Moore gained fame when he starred opposite Bo Derek in the 1979 comedy 10 and was nominated for a best actor Oscar for his 1981 role as a boozy millionaire in Arthur.

Clinton is serious when it comes to playing golf

WASHINGTON (R) — Like the proverbial "milk and honey," neither rain nor snow nor dark of night stops President Bill Clinton from playing golf. He heads for the links every chance he gets and works hard to shave strokes off his score. When the sun shines, reporters wonder if Mr. Clinton will grab his clubs and jump into the limo to find a nearby golf course — a journey he typically makes six times a month. But the same urge has been known to strike when it is raining or snowing. Even darkness is only an inconvenience. Long after the sun has set, Mr. Clinton will work his way along fairways with the help of a strobe light.

Fender to make upside-down Jimi Hendrix guitars

LOS ANGELES (R) — Thirty years after left-handed Jimi Hendrix played his way to fame on an upside-down guitar, the Fender guitar company said it will make a replica bearing the late rock star's name. Fender Musical Instruments and the Hendrix estate said special Jimi Hendrix guitar editions will be released this fall and next spring. Hendrix played a white electric fender stratocaster upside-down because he was left-handed.

Major slams lottery money awards to gays

London (R) — British Prime Minister John Major Tuesday condemned the award of National Lottery money to charities helping bisexuals, gay police officers and prostitutes. Speaking in parliament, Mr. Major expressed concern that the boards distributing millions of pounds raised each week from Britain's hugely successful lottery "from time to time make awards that are ill-founded and ill-judged. A small number do not in my judgment reflect the way parliament and the public expect lottery money to be spent," Mr. Major said at question time.

Shopping centre explosion in Brazil kills 39, injures 380

SAO PAULO (AFP) — At least 39 people died and 380 were injured when a ceiling collapsed after an explosion in a shopping centre in the Sao Paulo area, fire officials said.

The blast, which occurred around 1:00 p.m. (1600 GMT) Tuesday in Osasco, a suburb of the capital, was apparently caused by a gas leak, said Sao Paulo Fire Department official Jair Pacca De Lima.

The tragedy happened in the shopping centre's food court, where bars and restaurants are located.

He said rescue crews aided by bright lights provided by the army would continue the grim task of searching through the rubble for bodies during the night, but that there was no realistic chance of finding more survivors.

"Finding someone alive at this point would be a miracle," Mr. Pacca De Lima told reporters, adding that rescue crews would be working around the clock for the next 48 hours.

Another fire official said that as of late Tuesday five firefighters, police, military personnel and volunteers had scoured about 60 per cent of the accident site.

Two people were arrested on charges of looting, police said.

Most of the 39 fatalities occurred during the explosion and subsequent cave-in, but 14 people died at Osasco Regional Hospital, where some 100 seriously injured people were taken.

A further three people died at the central first aid facility, where another 250 victims were being treated, Civil Defence officials said.

Around 380 people were injured in the blast and cave-in.

So far, 18 bodies taken to the city morgue have been identified by relatives, and a list of all the dead and injured was distributed late Tuesday by city officials.

The mayor's office has called for a day of mourning for those killed in the accident.

Most of the victims were young people who were at the shopping centre looking for gifts for Valentine's Day, which in Brazil falls on Wednesday, June 12, health officials said.

At the time of the blast there were around 2,000 people inside the 200-store shopping centre. Most of the shoppers were having lunch in the food court, police said.

A preliminary investigation by experts has determined that a gas leak was the likely cause of the devastating explosion.

No force was used and no weapons were visible. The officials met Greenpeace Captain Ulf Brighander and Greenpeace spokesman Xavier Pastor, along with two translators, but the outcome of their discussions was not immediately clear.

China has previously made it clear the Greenpeace voyage, part of a campaign aimed at persuading China to halt nuclear weapons tests, is unwelcome and said the vessel was barred from entering Shanghai.

"Please stop this illegal act and leave our waters. This is a violation of international law," a radio message from one of the Chinese vessels said earlier as the Greenpeace was intercepted.

Chinese vessels intercept Greenpeace

ABOARD THE MV GREENPEACE (R) — Chinese officials boarded the environmentalist motor vessel Greenpeace Wednesday after intercepting the ship and its anti-nuclear activists and ordering it to leave Chinese waters.

The officials appeared friendly and shook hands with some of the 32 passengers and crew from 16 nations aboard the Greenpeace, which had just dropped anchor at Chang Jiang Kou — or Mouth of the Yangtze River — about 55 miles from Shanghai.

The officials, some with camouflage-type uniforms and others in white, boarded the Greenpeace from four boats that had earlier identified themselves as harbour pilot vessels.

No force was used and no weapons were visible.

Two more Burma democracy politicians quit party

RANGOON (R) — Two more elected representatives of Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy (NLD) have resigned from the opposition party, bringing the total of recent resignations to seven, Burmese official media said Wednesday.

Sein Maung and Han Tha Myint, both NLD members elected as representatives in a 1990 general election, submitted their resignations saying they no longer wanted a role in party politics, state-run newspapers said.

The newspapers said the resignations were accepted by the Multiparty Democracy General Election Commission, which was in charge of the 1990 election that the NLD won by a landslide.

The ruling State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC), which took power in 1988 after crushing pro-democracy demonstrations, called the election but never recognised the results and the NLD, which won 392 of 485 seats in contention, was never allowed to take power.

The resignations come following weeks of rumours that many NLD members may step down.

More than 250 NLD members, most of them elected representatives, were arrested in mid-May in a crackdown on democracy politicians ahead of a controversial party congress.

The SLORC said it had not arrested the NLD members, but only detained them for questioning to avoid "anarchy" that might have resulted from the congress.

The government released the politicians after about 10 days of detention.

Ms. Suu Kyi said afterwards some of them had been forced to sign letters promising they would quit the party.

But she told a crowd gathered outside her house soon after the May 26-29 party congress the NLD would not hold the members to any resignations signed while they were in detention.

Opposition sources said some NLD representatives had talked about stepping down because they did not agree with the tougher stance the party was taking.

After the party congress, Ms. Suu Kyi said the NLD would step up the momentum in its efforts for democracy. Among other projects, the party planned to write an alternative constitution to the one being drawn up by a SLORC-appointed convention.

Since then, the SLORC has passed a new law prohibiting anyone or any organisation from writing an alternative constitution.

Separately, the government continued its attack on Ms. Suu Kyi in state-run newspapers, urging her in a commentary to go back to England and leave the fight for democracy.

"It is time Ma Sun came to understand the attitude and the real desire of the Myanmar (Burmese) public," a commentary said, referring to Ms. Suu Kyi in a disrespectful manner.

"If so she should abandon the existing ways of her being under foreign influence to cause disintegration of the state and to return peacefully to her family in London."

"Ma Suu please go back. Democracy does not mean power."

22 die in Pakistan building collapse

KARACHI (AFP) — At least 22 people were killed and 40 injured when a three-storey building collapsed as they slept in southern Pakistan's Hyderabad city Wednesday, officials and rescue workers said.

Army engineers equipped with cranes joined a massive rescue operation mounted by police, paramilitary troops and volunteers.

Security forces cordoned off the area while ambulances rushed casualties to hospitals where an emergency was declared, witnesses said.

Shops and markets were closed in Hyderabad, 160 kilometres north of here, following the tragedy, residents said.

The survivors were shifted to a nearby building, where wailing women beat their heads and chests in mourning, witnesses said.

Officials said the 55-year-old building caved in around dawn with a big thud, creating panic in the area.

Neighbours rushed to the spot as people trapped under tonnes of concrete screamed for help.

Rescue workers said they had retrieved the bodies of 12 children, five women and five men from the dilapidated building occupied by around 80 people.

Those affected were mostly poor vendors or small contractors.

Residents said 14 families lived in the building which was divided into a number of small apartments. The occupants were all close relatives.

Sind Chief Minister Syed Abdullah Shah who visited the site and met the injured in hospital, termed the incident as "terrible and unfortunate."

He also announced cash compensation for the victims.

Around 40 of the injured were taken to hospitals and doctors said several were in a critical condition. A search for more bodies feared trapped under the debris was still on, they said.

"All-out efforts are being made to rescue the people who are under the debris," an official said.

A witness told AFP by telephone that the scene looked as if the structure had been "bulldozed."

The mishap took place at about 5:30 a.m. (0030 GMT), residents said. Most of the male members of the affected families were either sleeping outside, the building because of a power breakdown during the night, or had gone to the mosques for dawn prayers, residents said.

"I thought it was an earthquake and rushed towards my house soon after the prayers. A huge cloud of dust had covered the building," said Sharmim Khan, an inmate of the ill-fated building.

"But everything was lost. My two uncles and their three children were all dead. I recognised the children from their clothes," Mr. Khan told AFP by telephone from the office of the private Edhi Trust Welfare Organisation which arranged funerals for the victims.

Some residents said the overnight rainfall might have caused the mishap, but officials said the collapse was the result of deep excavation in an adjacent plot whose owner wanted to put up a building with a basement.

17 SAS soldiers killed in Australia helicopter crash

SYDNEY (AFP) — At least 17 elite soldiers and aircrew died and 11 were injured Wednesday when two helicopters crashed and burned during an anti-terrorist training mission in Northern Australia, a Defence Department spokesman said.

The two Blackhawk helicopters collided in darkness outside Townsville in Queensland.

"There are 17 killed and 11 wounded in hospital. But these figures can change," defence force spokesman Brigadier Adrian D'Hage told AFP.

The two Blackhawks collided while travelling at 60-90 knots, crashing about 50 metres to the ground, he said.

Bomb burst into flames on impact, he said.

The helicopters were reportedly carrying a crew of four and 10 Special Air Service (SAS) regiment troops who were to practice roping, rappelling and recovery as part of counter-terrorist training.

They were engaged in an exercise focusing on recovering people from the tops of buildings which the troops carry out in the bush because of the noise it makes, he said.

Brig. D'Hage declined to speculate on the cause of the accident at the remote High Range training area, west of Townsville, saying a full inquiry would be carried out.

Lieutenant Colonel Andy Reynolds of the Defence Department said it was believed to be Australia's worst peacetime military training accident since 82 men died in the collision of two naval ships in 1964.

The crash was the second major accident involving Australia's Blackhawk helicopters within four years. One was lost in an accident in June 1992.

The Australian army acquired 39 Blackhawks between February 1988 and January 1991.

Although manufactured by Sikorsky in the U.S., most of those in Australian army service were assembled at the Hawker De Havilland plant in Sydney.

Some of the Blackhawk fleet were reported to have been grounded awaiting essential spares with as few as half a dozen operational at some stages.

The problem was expected to have been overcome by now.

Similar problems were also experienced by U.S. defence users.

The SAS is an elite unit.

Modelled on the British SAS regiment, the Australian regiment was formed in 1957, and shares the British unit's motto of "who dares wins," along with their sand-coloured beret and winged dagger insignia.

They form Australia's last-resort counter-terrorist force and will play a role in security for the Sydney 2000 Olympics Games.

SAS troopers operating in patrols of six men and are trained in free-fall parachuting, helicopter insertion and amphibious and submarine-based operations.

They have played a leading role in the resolution of almost every recent counter-terrorist exercise in Australia.

SAS troops are known within the army as the "chicken stranglers" — for their ability to live off the land during weeks-long patrols behind enemy lines.

There are around 500 SAS troops in three Sabre Squadrons based in Perth.

Two other SAS soldiers are known to have died in accidents during counter-terrorist training with live ammunition since 1980.

Thurmond, Warner among winners in 5 primaries

WASHINGTON (R) — South Carolina's Republican Sen. Strom Thurmond cast a vote of confidence for 93-year-old political legend Sen. Strom Thurmond and Virginia Republican Sen. John Warner easily defeated a conservative challenger as voters in five states cast primary ballots Tuesday.

Sen. Thurmond won 65 per cent of the vote against Harold Worley, 45, who had tried to convince voters the senator was too old for the job.

Mr. Worley received 27 per cent.

Sen. Thurmond, whose primary victory was expected, will face in the fall a Democratic political newcomer less than half his age, millionaire businessman Elliot Cose, 42.

The most important of the day's primaries was Virginia's Republican Senate race, a bruising battle which was seen as a microcosm of the national battle for the soul of the Republican Party, pitting conservatives against the "country club" establishment Republicans.

With 99 per cent of the vote in, Sen. Warner had 66 per cent to 34 per cent for former Reagan administration Budget Director James Miller.

Mr. Miller conceded the election to Sen. Warner with a veiled slap at the senator's party loyalty.

Sen. Warner won handily despite accusations of treachery from the party's new conservative leaders that he helped defeat Oliver North, the gung-ho ex-Marine implicated in the Iran-contra scandal.

Col. North was the Republican Senate candidate in 1994 and the party squabble helped re-elect Democrat Charles Robb, a son-in-law of former President Lyndon Johnson.

John Warner, a three-term senator with seniority on several key committees, will face Democrat Mark Warner, a millionaire telecommunications executive, in the fall. The two Warners are not related.

In Maine, the 1994 candidate for governor, Susan Collins, won the Republican Senate nomination against two rivals whose campaigns were noted for exchange of bitter accusations of sexual misconduct and sleazy campaigning.

Former Governor Joe Brennan was projected to beat four opponents for the Democratic spot.

In Arkansas, Democrats decided between Attorney General Winston Bryant and state Sen. Lu Hardin in a runoff for the right to contest the Senate seat of retiring Democrat David Pryor.

Republicans will choose their candidate later.

Right action

IN A RARE display of public outrage at the violation of the country's environment and ecosystem, the residents of Fuheis demonstrated this week protesting that the cement factory was polluting the air they breathe and the environment in which they live. Public protest over non-political issues is indeed a rarity in the Middle East; the fact that the people of Fuheis decided to act against what they perceive as a threat to their health is a good sign even though the answer to the problem at hand is not so simple.

As a matter of fact the cement factory has been taking some measures to alleviate the crisis caused by the location of a major industry in the middle of an urban region. Proper city zoning, a well-developed "science" in many countries, was introduced in Jordan a long time ago in order to ensure that urban districts are more manageable and liveable. In the case of Fuheis, the location of the cement plant was dictated by the availability of the principal natural resource for producing cement. When the plant was built in the 1960s east of the town, Fuheis was a tiny village. Since then it grew and spread alongside and around the plant. What could have been done is to install right from the beginning the necessary equipment to reduce the rise of dust and other pollutants to manageable proportions. However, the problem is still there and whatever was done appears to be insufficient.

His Majesty King Hussein raised the issue more than a year ago when he wondered if anyone had studied the effect of the huge amounts of dust that emanates from the chimneys of the huge cement plant. The King said then that members of his own family had suffered ill-health from the pollution of the air in the area and called for an effective remedy. Now that the citizens of the affected town have decided to act by demonstrating peacefully against the continued violation of their basic health needs, perhaps the concerned authorities together with the management of the cement factory would introduce the right kind of equipment to the plant in a bid to rectify the problem once and for all. Meanwhile all new building of the houses should be transferred to areas which are less prone to receive pollutants from the factory. In any case, we naturally support the action taken by the people of Fuheis and wish that other cities and towns in the country would defend the environment whenever it is threatened.

ARABIC PRESS COMMENTARIES

THE LATEST Hizbollah attack on Israeli troops in Southern Lebanon made a mockery of the so-called security zone along Israel's northern borders and rendered ineffective all Israel's military campaigns inside Lebanon, said Munes Al Razzaz, a writer for Al Ra'i daily, Wednesday. The attack, which resulted in the death of five Israeli soldiers and the injury of six others, has proved once again that Israel can by no means enjoy peace and security while at the same time maintaining its occupation of Arab territories, stressed the writer. Indeed, this latest attack, which occurred despite the Israeli-Hizbollah ceasefire agreement concluded in April, is a clear message to the Jewish state's premier-elect Beeyamin Netanyahu that resistance attacks will continue as long as Israel occupies Lebanese territory, he added. The writer said that no matter who assumes power in Israel and regardless of the aggressive nature of the Israeli army, the armed struggle against Israeli forces are bound to continue; and if Netanyahu refuses to change his mind about escalating the campaigns against the resistance, his troops and the Israeli society as a whole will continue to be targeted by suicide attacks. He said that Israel can avoid this kind of war of attrition by simply withdrawing from all the occupied lands, in compliance with U.N. resolutions.

WHILE EXPRESSING hope that the Arab leaders, in their coming summit meeting in Cairo, will arrive at a minimum level of coordination among themselves concerning the Arab-Israeli conflict, a writer for Al Ra'i daily said the heads of state have a very difficult task at hand. The Arab leaders are expected to keep the door open for contacts with the new Israeli government in response to a call by the U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher despite Israel's adamant position concerning the Jerusalem question, the Jewish settlements and the withdrawal from Arab lands, he said. However, agreement among the leaders vis-à-vis these chronic issues has no great chance of success because they still seem divided as a result of the Gulf war despite strenuous efforts, particularly on the part of Egypt, to contain these differences, according to the writer. Furthermore, it is the emergence of Netanyahu as premier in the Jewish state and his declared policies concerning the Golan Heights that brought the Arab leaders together, rather than the issue of Jerusalem, he added. The writer said that the exclusion of Iraq from the summit means that the Arabs are far from agreement on internal issues, and therefore it would take a miracle to make them agree on external affairs as well as a mechanism to reach a final settlement with Israel on all tracks.

The Great Arab Revolt and the great Arab dream

Dr. Ahmad Y. Majdoubeh

THE ANNIVERSARY of the Great Arab Revolt (last Monday) is an occasion for both celebration and assessment. Celebration because many of the ideals envisioned upon and since the launching of the great uprising have either been realised or on the way to being realised; assessment because much still needs to be done before the whole dream comes true.

Two points need to be stated from the outset. The first is that — as obvious from much of the literature about the event (take for instance His Majesty King Hussein's speech in New York a couple of days ago and the Crown Prince Hassan's article published in the local press last Monday) — the event was not simply thought of as a rebellion against the injustices and oppressive measures of the then dictatorial Turks but as an attempt to restore to the Arabs (at least the eastern part of the Arab Nation) the many basic human rights which had been denied them and the central role they have been deprived of.

The aim, as the King's and Crown Prince's pieces make clear, is the launching of an all-encompassing Arab Renaissance in the spheres of politics, economics, social progress, human rights, religion and ideology. There was a sense that the Arab-Islamic Nation had fallen, and there was a need therefore to bring about a categorical change in the life of the nation as a whole.

The second is that the Great Arab Revolt is not a historical event which attempted against all odds to realise the dreams and ideals of the Arab peoples and which partly succeeded and partly failed, due to insurmountable global (and later inter-Arab) obstacles. Rather, it is a process which was launched on June 10, 1916, though it had become deeply entrenched in the Arab psyche decades (if not centuries) before. Seen as a process, the Arab Revolt is far from over. It is still with us, partly in the form of the modern Jordan which is and partly in the form of the Jordan to be.

In the form of modern Jordan, much has been achieved in both the letter and spirit of things. One can say a lot in this respect: about its moderate, middle-ground, reconciliation, common-sensical, practical, reasonable and up-to-date conception and position vis-à-vis its own role, vis-à-vis links with the Arab brethren and vis-à-vis its relationship with other nations.

It is indeed miraculous for a country which found itself amidst regional and global turbulence to have kept the spirit of moderation, middle-groundness, reconciliation, common-sense, etc. From the start, and up until now, Jordan has successfully (though not always easily) avoided and rejected extremism in all its forms when circumstances from the beginning of the century have aimed at nothing but the encouragement of extremism. Such spirit of moderation is reflected in almost all aspects of the Jordanian state: in politics, religion, economics, education, daily life, and so forth. In all of these, it is neither extremely conservative nor extremely liberal. At this point in history, this seems to be the best approach.

Much can also be said about the country's pluralism, democracy and spirit of freedom. The Jordanian society is immensely diverse, ethnically, demographically, geographically and religiously. Such diversity is immensely respected, protected, and catered to — especially since the introduction of democratic life in 1989. In its protection of diversity and pluralism, Jordan is almost a unique phenomenon in the region. Freedom, at almost all levels, has also been recently felt. Take freedom of expression, for example. In the media, writers and commentators (those who have something profound to say and those who do not, etc.) have been debating issues which are next to impossible to debate in many of our neighbouring regions.

The Jordanian society is also fairly open and open-minded about new ideas. We feel this in the private and (to a lesser extent) public education, in business, in social habits, in styles of life, in food, etc.

Jordan is also keenly aware of its central role and ties with the rest of the Arab World and shows a great deal of respect to the wishes, needs, desires and aspirations of the Arab Nation. Before it takes a step of any sort, it ponders profoundly on its implications on relations with Arab states. It takes Arab solidarity and Arab integration seriously. It is significant that it did not work out an agreement with Israel until Egypt and the Palestinians had done so. Jordan could have done it first. It is also significant that during the Gulf war, Jordan kept insisting on an Arab-Arab solution to the crisis. This is a spirit inherited from the Great Arab Revolt — notice that it is an "Arab" movement.

All of this must be admitted, and Jordan ought to be encouraged to continue on the path begun in 1916. I say "to continue" but much needs to be done still.

While there is, fortunately, very little to cover at the level of intention, ideal, theory and policy, there is ample room for improvement and development at the level of implementation, application and realisation of the various projects which are meant to make Jordan an effective modern state and an example to others in the region.

Much needs to be done at the level of institutionalisation. Many of our institutions are either too lenient and lax or too rigid and inflexible, depending on who is in charge; the person at the head of the institution is more powerful than the institution. The decisions taken at many of our institutions are not collectively made. Many of our establishments (to the public and the private sectors) do poor, fair and (at best) good work, but not very good or excellent. Some of them, which are supposed to be doing crucial work, are merely symbolic. Why is it that we exert a great deal of effort and spend a great amount of money to establish an institution but do not bother much to subject the institution to rigorous, constant (at least periodic) evaluation and assessment?

Our sports teams, our civil servants, our scholars, our teachers, our singers, our motorists, our farmers, our carpenters, our mechanics, our administrators, our poets, our novelists are still either at the level of mediocre in performance or at the level of fair and good. Many of our streets are full of holes, many of our water pipes and sewers still leak constantly, our drinking water is still not up to the standards, and our butter milk and water bottles are impossible to open.

If Jordan, on the basis of the ideals of the Arab Revolt, is to be an example to others in the region (and I believe it should), if it is, in the words of John Winthrop, to be a "city on a hill" for others to look up to and learn from, and if it is to take part in and perhaps even bring about an Arab renaissance (to an Arab World which is almost hopelessly fractionalised, fragmented and disoriented), it has to continue unwaveringly on the path which it has embarked bravely on, toward full pluralism, democracy, human rights and freedom of expression. But it also has to confront the various obstacles and weaknesses courageously.

Jordan is entitled and qualified, potentially and in actuality, to play a central role in the rise of the Arab Nation which has long fallen and slumbered.

If Netanyahu sticks to his promises, war could be the result

By William Pfaff

PARIS — An astonishingly large part of the discussion of Israel's policy options, particularly in American circles, seems to assume that the new prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, can do as he pleases in security matters. The Arab reaction is not a constraint.

Mr. Netanyahu's campaign promised peace plus security, with no concessions to the Arabs. He said that Israel would keep the Golan Heights, keep the existing colonies on the West Bank — including Hebron's — or even expand them; recapture Gaza if that seemed useful, and also stop Hamas suicide bombings inside Israel and the shelling of Israeli villages by Islamic militants in southern Lebanon.

His opponent, Shimon Peres, was merely promising peace, acknowledging that this would have to be paid for by territorial and political concessions to the Palestine Liberation Organisation and Syria.

Mr. Peres and his predecessor, Yitzhak Rabin, had already taken a dangerous line with respect to the PLO. They yielded Yasser Arafat enough — barely — to keep him as a negotiating partner, but not enough really to satisfy the Palestinians.

The Israeli objective was an autonomous but essentially powerless Palestinian entity, wrapped in Israeli military power, incorporating protected Jewish colonies, economically dependent upon Israel — an Israeli client-state, or a client shared between Israel and Jordan. They were coming very close to getting this.

Mr. Netanyahu wants more. Most discussion, at least in circles sympathetic to the Likud Party, takes for granted that he can get more. This is not true. He cannot do so without totally discrediting the PLO, which would be dangerous to Israel.

If all PLO plausibility is destroyed, Palestinians in and around Israel will be driven toward that desperate and nihilistic struggle wanted by those in the Arab World who from the beginning have condemned the so-called peace process, insisted that Israel would never go through with it and demanded struggle to the death against Israel (and the United States).

The austere and independent Hebrew-language daily Ha'aretz wrote last week that if Israel's new government does not fulfill the promises of its predecessor to complete Israel's withdrawal from Hebron and release more political prisoners, or if Mr. Netanyahu does as he has said he would do and eliminates the PLO presence in Jerusalem, the PLO will have no reason not to renounce its promises as well. Indeed, its political survival could depend on renouncing them, breaking off cooperation with Israel.

Why should Yasser Arafat's police force continue to cooperate with Israel in hunting down Hamas, as it has been doing? Ha'aretz notes that if Israel should renege on its promise to return Gaza, to raze down terrorists, its army would find that "there now are more than 20,000 armed Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. That means there would be war." In that eventuality, the relative insecurity of the last weeks of the Peres government might look good to Israeli citizens.

The sometimes overlooked aspect of this affair is that Mr. Netanyahu was not elected by people who to their majority are hostile to "the peace process," or to some peace process.

The issue was security, not peace with the Arabs. People wanted the one without losing the other. They thought that by voting against the "peace process" as conducted by Mr. Peres, they would have both security and peace.

But a crucial underlying issue was social, even cultural in the American political sense, as the new prime minister and his American campaign advisers understood. There was a paradox in what happened. The American-influenced Mr. Netanyahu, and his American minders, with hyper-Americanised campaign tactics and advertisements, mobilised that part of the Israeli public that most hates and fears what may be called the "Americanisation" of Israel.

The coalition that defeated Shimon Peres is described by the Israeli mass-market daily Yedioth Ahronoth as made up not only of religious voters and expansionists but those "who feel forgotten, cut off from modern Israel's society, who see the Labour Party and the left as Israel's ruling class in politics, culture, and economy — domains in which they feel excluded. They are not entirely wrong to do so."

When Yitzhak Rabin's widow said immediately after the election that she felt like packing her bags and leaving Israel, she was unintentionally confirming the existence of this cultural breach in Israel's society.

However, the cultural war is mixed up with what has been a real war with the Arabs. Voting on one front inevitably had consequences, potentially grave ones, on the other front.

Those Israeli voters who refused to trust Israel's security to Mr. Peres, because he is a cosmopolitan and Europeanised intellectual, a diplomatic realist, voted instead for the "security" promised by Mr. Netanyahu. But they did this without acknowledging that if Mr. Netanyahu acts as he has promised to act, he will inevitably bring them insecurity, or even war.

Agreements to what?

To the Editor:

AFTER READING Mr. Arafat's statement: "the independent state will be announced soon ... and Mr. Netanyahu promises to respect the agreements," I could not help but wonder what the Palestinian leader takes us for.

I hope he does not think the Palestinian people did not see the contradiction in what he said. Of course Mr. Netanyahu will respect the agreements, but the fact Mr. Arafat conveniently ignored was that the agreements never guaranteed an independent state. Furthermore, it seems that Mr. Arafat did not comprehend Mr. Netanyahu's refusal of the idea of an independent state in his debate with former Prime Minister Shimon Peres. Statements like the above mentioned can only mean two things. Either Mr. Arafat never actually understood that when he signed the declaration of principles (DOP) he robbed the Palestinians of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence or he thinks we are ignorant and uneducated enough to allow such contradicting statement to pass unnoticed.

Despite the fact that it has been a long time, in the following paragraphs I will try to scratch the surface on the injustices in the DOP and the letters exchanged after the signing.

The first point deals with the basis on which the end result is to be achieved. Article 1 of the DOP states that the final stage of the "peace process" is a "permanent settlement based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338." Negotiations based on these two resolutions only demonstrate how the PLO and Israel completely ignored all other resolutions passed by the all U.N. bodies, in particular Resolution 194, which calls for the compensation and repatriation of Palestinian refugees. Furthermore, the agreement is said to take place in the form of "interim" phases, yet it lacks a mechanism to go from one stage to the next.

Second, the agreement fails to mention the Palestinians not residing in the West Bank and Gaza, living without a state in Lebanon, Syria etc., who make up more than fifty per cent of the Palestinian population. This fact alone raises doubt as to the extent to which the agreement is comprehensive and fair.

Third, careful study of the DOP reveals that the Israeli army can recede cities it once withdrew from any time they feel Israeli interests are being threatened. Finally, in the letters exchanged after the signing, Yasser Arafat renounced terrorism and violence. This is in effect an admission of guilt that the PLO was a terrorist organisation; however, the Palestinians and most of the world saw the PLO as a National Organisation for the Liberation of Palestine. Moreover, the PLO's acts of resistance, which were responses to the Israeli occupation, were said to be acts of terror and violence; what a shameful way to describe the history of the Palestinian resistance movement.

People should look beyond the headlines and seek the truth in matters of life and death for us. The truth in this case is unfortunately twisted.

Behaviour mutations

To the Editor:

Amman downtown (al balad) would be the perfect centre of analysis to study the changing behaviour of men as spring arrives.

Taking a walk in autumn or winter down the very same streets is out at all the same as going for a stroll at this time of the year.

Going for a walk in the summer can often result in a nightmare event though one does try not to reveal one's "charms", going around dressed in the strictest possible way — long skirts that go down to the ground, tightly buttoned shirts etc.

Despite all these precautions, the same type of dress which only differs from winter as the austere stripes make room to the flowery patterns suddenly become a sensation among the members of the opposite sex.

The devouring looks, the arms that became longer (and in what way!), the hands that when you expect them least touch you skillfully; as one turns around incredulous and amazed to see the face of the shameless impudent, he is already slipping away like a squirrel among the crowd.

What is wrong with men as spring arrives? Can they no longer control their passion? Is it that this season produces mutations in men?

Begoña Alonso y De Paz,

Protesting the rules

To the Editor:

Amy Henderson's report "Tour agents challenge new regulations in court, warn against implications for small businesses" (Jordan Times, June 9, 1996) prompts us to make the following comments on this statement of the Secretary General of the Ministry of Tourism and Antiquities: "The regulations needed to be revised and we reviewed these measures with the last board of directors of the travel agents' association, which offered no objections, save for one member of the board who withheld his opinion. But I cannot say anymore than this since it is a case before the court."

We would like to clarify that the previous board never agreed, or approved, verbally or in writing; the regulations issued April 1, 1996, in the official gazette, and objected over time, as per letters No. 34/164 and 3/50, dated 6/9/94 and 28/5/95 respectively, submitted to the minister of tourism and antiquities.

We still confirm that the previous board never showed willingness to rise the bank guarantee from JD 5,000 to JD 50,000, as intended for implementation.

Society on the Move

Steady as she goes for the men in blue, land ho for the diplomatic crew

The recent promotions to major general of three senior Public Security Department Officers were just that — promotions in rank. Maj. Gen. Nimer Amoud continues in his position as Assistant Director General for Administration, and Maj. Gen. Abdul Raouf Hussein stays on as Assistant Director General for Traffic. Both posts were promotions made effective last March in sweeping changes undertaken by PSD Director General Nasouh Maheiddin, soon after his own assumption of the top police post. For the record, the PSD chief was himself promoted last week to Lieutenant General and was General Intelligence Directorate Chief Samih Bakki. Back to the PSD, Maj. Gen. Salman Maaytah remains Inspector General. The promotions to major general were slated to be announced just about this time, say officials and observers, and should not be taken as a signal of possible reorganisation.

REVIVING UP IN THE MASHREQ: It appears that the journalism strategy, training, organisation and networking programme of the European Community, known simply as MedMedia, may be picking up steam again, following the beginning of the year decision to halt operations until internal conflicts could be resolved. The news we have learned is that the BBC World Service's Tudor Lomas has been seconded to MedMedia and will be coming to Amman for one year starting in mid-August as director of the Jamstone in Jordan Project. This regional project will bring European experts to the region for short workshops and offer "far more" on-site training and assistance. The Jamstone Project (we have not determined why the MedMedia folks chose to spell jamstone with a "j") is designed to be a focus for MedMedia in the region and a conduit to its homebase in Brussels. Events planned for the autumn include a radio production master class in Jerusalem, a feature-writing masterclass, a senior managers workshop at Taybet Zammam, and a journalists' roundtable in Cairo. Our understanding is that radio Nederland Training Centre and the BBC, both active partners in MedMedia works, have for a long time planned to move their work to Jordan to reward "third countries" for their involvement in MedMedia objectives. So while other operations — about 70 approved projects for 1996 — remain on hold in Brussels, we can expect only two of them to proceed: one being the Mashreq project under the directorship of Mr. Lomas. Another similar project involves the Mashreq countries.

SCOUTS TIMES 2 Meanwhile, Trevor Mostyn, who was a MedMedia programme coordinator until the decision to put activities on hold, linked up, on a free-lance, temporary consultancy basis, with the Cardiff-based Thomson Foundation. The NGO was the brainchild of Lord Thomson of Fleetville, the owner of many regional newspapers including the Times of London. Established in 1962, the foundation seeks "support projects to encourage democratic media in print, radio and T.V. around the world." Mr. Mostyn was in Amman last week with Thomson Foundation Broadcasting Consultant Meliton Edwards to informally scout out what is two Welshmen called the "budget line" of various Jordanian NGOs interested in training for their civic society projects to make them more effective, and how they can utilise the press in relation to that aim. The bottom line for the foundation is to help in making these NGOs effective. Stressing that their contacts in Jordan were strictly informal at this stage, Messrs. Edwards and Mostyn expected that one of them will return again soon to further pursue proposal preparations with the NGOs for submission to the European Union for funding. While they were in the region, the two gentlemen also scouted NGOs in Damascus, Beirut, the Palestine National Authority, Israel and Egypt.

SO LONG, PARTNERS: Mission accomplished in Jordan, the Americans are leaving in droves, but most of their replacements have been named and some are already here getting acclimatised to Jordan's summer and the twists and turns of the U.S. Embassy compound. Let us begin with USAID Mission Director William Tom Oliver who will head back to Washington with his wife Tina and their two children to become director of the Food For Peace Programme worldwide, which is based at USAID/Washington. What we know thus far of his replacement is his name — Lew Lucke — and that he is coming from USAID in Bolivia. In the Political Section, Chief Political Counselor William Jordan is scheduled to depart on July 5th and is transferring to Paris with his family. Paris is not a bad place to take a bit of a breather, and that may well be what this is all about. Mr. Jordan's replacement is Roberta Newell, who has been in Jordan studying Arabic for the last nine months. Ms. Newell served as desk officer for Jordan at the State Department before arriving in Amman. Deputy Political Counselor Margot Sullivan left for Washington last week for her new senior posting as special assistant to Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbot. Ms. Sullivan's husband, Administrative Counselor Joseph Huggins, also returned to the State Department to become director of allawances. Ms. Sullivan's replacement arrived in Amman last week. She is Claire Osley, and has a good 10 years of working in the foreign service in Nigeria, Morocco and at the State Department. She arrived from Tunis where she was studying at the U.S.'s Arabic Language Study Centre. She has arrived with husband Michael Gluck, a Ph.D. in medical engineering who will no doubt explore teaching possibilities around town or further. Over at the US Information Service Jonathan Rice, the cultural affairs officer, bids farewell to Jordan and "howdy" to Abu Dhabi where he will become the public affairs officer. His political scientist wife, Laurie Brand, whom he wed right here in Jordan of Umi Qais, is completing some research and will probably join her husband for some more long-distance marital arrangements between the Arab World and the world of academia on the campus of the University of Southern California where she teaches. Mr. Rice's replacement is Susan Ziadhe, a Palestinian-American, who will come here in September from Jerusalem where she is assistant public affairs officer. Also heading out and back to State, is head of the consular section Ray Clare, who has probably met more Jordanians in his nearly three years here than any of his colleagues. All we know of his replacement is that he is named Stephen Maloney. Replacing Press Attaché Vangala "Van" Ram, who departed for Kaza, is Stephen Thibault, who is due in Amman on June 24, semi-crossing with Van, as he will come from Thailand. Meanwhile the press has been fortunate in having Aleta Wenger manning the press attaché's desk in the interim. Ms. Wenger arrived last summer and has since been working in several of the embassy's offices.

CHEERIO: Also leaving Jordan this month are some young troops from the British embassy. After about three years of service here, James and Kerry Arroyo and Nick and Cathy Word say farewell. James Arroyo served as second secretary in the embassy's political section, and his wife Kerry added her talents to the ballet and drama classes at the New English School (NES) as the representative of the British Ballet Organisation (BBO) in Jordan. Kerry ran the dance studio at the NES and the BBO Examination Centre in the Kingdom. Stepping into her shoes as BBO representative is Gaynor Price. The Arroyos are off to Cairo this weekend, where James will continue his foreign service career in the political office, again as second secretary. Kerry is expected to contribute her forte, again, either in teaching, community work or both. No replacement has yet been named for Mr. Arroyo. Visa Officer Nick Ward, heads out with his wife Cathy, but for them it's back to London where Nick will return to the Immigration Service. Cathy too, leaves the NES, where she taught drama and just helped stage the time-honoured musical "West Side Story." Although information on Mr. Word's replacement has not yet arrived, we can tell you that his name is Leigh Culver and he is coming from the Immigration Service in London. The Words plan to leave Amman at the end of this month. With both departures friends and associates say good-bye to two hardworking couples who also had plenty of time for some exciting social activity. In fact, Second Secretary for Political and Economic Affairs Martin Cronin threw another one of his famous "hot" parties to send off the Arroyos and Words. Word is the evening lived up to the Cronin reputation.

PHIR MILENGE: Another couple leaves today. They are Alka and Shariq Ben Raza, who have been in Jordan for more than five years. Alka worked until recently for Mexican Television, in fact she began the network's Amman bureau. Alka recently, she was president of the United Nations Women's Guild of Jordan. Shariq was a senior officer at the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA). The environment-friendly couple are heading for Nigeria where Mr. Ben Raza will take up a senior position with another U.N. agency, the UN Drug Control Programme. The Ben Razas expect to be back in Amman in the late fall to collect the remainder of their household, so we may just be able to catch up with them in person again.

A NORDIC NIGHT: For those of you invited to the June 23 reception in celebration of Norwegian National Day, you will have an opportunity to see Martin Cronin wearing another hat. This time he and his band-buddies in the ever-expanding Azraq Blues Band have been retained by Norwegian Ambassador Tove Kijewski to help mark Norway's Constitution Day, which in actuality falls on May 17. Mrs. Kijewski, however, was out of the country on that date and selected to host her event on the eve of Midsummer Day — Europe's celebration of the summer solstice dating from the pre-Christian times, also called St. John the Baptist's Day, observed by lighting bonfires, especially on mountaintops, dancing around and leaping over fires and other ancient customs. That the invitations note that those who may wish to ore welcome to "linger on and celebrate Midsummer's night" may be a sign of things to come. In any case, a happy belated Constitution Day.

Hilmi Deeb Saleh

PRIZE WINNER WITH A MESSAGE: Applause is in order for Hilmi Deeb Saleh, a Jordanian youth studying at the University of Munster, in Germany. Hilmi received the Ideal Foreign Student Prize from the German Institution for Academic Exchange, better known as DAAD. Hilmi studies biology and is preparing for his Ph.D. He is involved in many campus activities, and is particularly interested in cultural exchange and helping foreign students find ways to resolve their difficulties in adjusting to their new educational environment. He suggests that Arab students in particular should be made aware and take it upon themselves as well to learn about the current social climate in Europe so that they are not too surprised by what they may encounter in terms of dashed expectations. One of his major goals while studying was to make those around him comprehend that the stereotyping of Arabs as terrorists is a bigoted policy which should be addressed and abolished. DAAD, which was established in 1925 and was reformed in 1950, today is considered one of the most distinguished cultural institutions in Germany. It awarded Hilmi DM 2,000. Sehr Gut, Hilmi!

Beat brother Ferlinghetti says rebellion still rules

By Jude Webber
Reuters

ROME (R)—The beat still goes on for Lawrence Ferlinghetti even though the big brother of one of the coolest cultural crazes this century is now pushing 80.

The white-haired U.S. poet, painter and publisher, who put the beat generation on the literary map when he printed Allen Ginsberg's controversial poem Howl, wants to be more than just a fossilised icon of 1950s youthful counter-culture.

"Most of the artists and writers around today are sound asleep in the face of the coming world cataclysm, political, social and ideological," he told Reuters in Rome, where he was opening two shows of his paintings and line drawings. "They ought to wake up and try and save civilisation, save culture."

At 77, Ferlinghetti writes by night and draws or paints in his San Francisco studio by day. The problem with being a "beat," he says, is that people think of you in the past tense. "The thing that's wrong with all these beat shows that have been going on — most of them have a cut-off date of 1965 and Kousac's the only one that's dead," Ferlinghetti said.

Jack Kerouac's novel On The Road has become the beat bible, epitomising an urgent quest for escape from conventional daily life into a fast-lane world of radicalism, spontaneity and free expression, fuelled by sex, drink and drugs.

Like Neal Cassady, his friend and inspiration for On The Road, Kerouac burnt out and died young. Not so other beat luminaries such as Ginsberg and novelist William Burroughs.

"Practically all the others are still alive and writing, creating," Ferlinghetti said. "It's still a continuing movement. In fact it's still only rebellion around."

The beat generation took off in 1955 when Ginsberg gave the first public reading of Howl, a powerful long work that explicitly tread his homosexuality and launched a stinging attack on a staid and soulless world.

Ferlinghetti, who was older than Ginsberg and his friends and admits "seemed square compared with them, was there. "But I didn't know them well enough to go out afterwards," he said.

Born in New York in 1919 of an Italian immigrant father and French-Portuguese Sephardic Jewish mother, Ferlinghetti lived in the U.S. Navy during the 1944 D-Day landings and studied for a doctorate at the Sorbonne in Paris after World War II. "I was outside the whole thing. I was leading a straight life. I was married, living in a conventional house, totally straight. I didn't smoke dope. I didn't take hallucinogenics till years later."

He soon joined in, publishing Howl under the City Lights imprint he had set up in San Francisco with a bookshop of the same name, and defending it in a famous 1957 obscenity trial.

The beat generation got publicity, Ginsberg got off and Ferlinghetti got a reputation for commitment that he later confirmed with peace crusades and poems such as Tyrannus Nix, blasting U.S. President Richard Nixon for the Vietnam War.

His poetry can hit hard but it has a lyrical lightness that he stresses by using simple language and playing with the arrangement of lines on the printed page.

Like one of his earliest and best-known hooks, A Coney Island Of The Mind, Ferlinghetti recalls his New York youth in the title of his latest work of poetry, A Far Rockaway Of The Heart, which he is due to send to his publisher this autumn.

"Far Rockaway — one subway goes there... It's like where there's some beaches and when I was a kid, to go out to Far Rockaway on a Sunday, I mean that was paradise, like going to Coney Island," he said. "So it's very evocative for me."

Tall and lean with light blue eyes, he is talkative and anecdotal. He laughs easily, has a Bohemian air with his beard and anti-nuclear earring and looks far younger than his age.

He sounds it, though, when he rails against American youth — "you wear your baseball cap backwards... You dye your hair 16 colours, you try to look as ugly as possible" — and postmodern art — "you have a heap of coal in one corner of the gallery and a heap of old clothes in another and half a cow hanging on the wall and that's a show."

The problem, he says, is that culture is under attack. "The universal television brainwash has completely deadened people," he said. "Television is just one thing. Repressive, brutal states around the world. Consumer society itself. The subjective has effectively been killed."

Ferlinghetti says the beat generation's desire to challenge and rebel explains its enduring appeal. "How long is it since a major painter or novelist in any country has made a powerful statement about what's happening in the world, about anything?"

He claims to have "a really dark view of the future" and

Lawrence Ferlinghetti stands next to books published by City Lights Publications and below one of his paintings inside City Lights Books in San Francisco. says the "constant attack on the subjective and... what is trying to kill the spirit" is well worth rebelling against now.

In any case, the past is only part of the story. One of his Rome exhibitions is called Engaging Mind and features drawings that he only did the week before. "I don't want to be just a nostalgic old fart numbling about the good old days," he said.

"I'm not in a glass case yet."

Cool summer breeze

By Jean-Claude Elias

ALTHOUGH SUMMER is not here yet, technically speaking, the temperatures that have prevailed this week make us reluctant to undertake a task that puts too much pressure on our neurons. Some readers of this column have recently told me they find it sometimes too technical or, at another extreme, too philosophical.

Such comments couldn't have been expressed with better timing. I've been planning to share with you some of the "gems" I've come across in the past few years in the computer literature, in specialised magazines or even in the very real 16 years of my professional activity in Jordan. One can call them jokes, anecdotes or simply funny stories. I haven't made up any of them however.

Cooler than an ice filled soft drink, more incredible than fiction, they are the reflection of the amazing speed of change in information technology has been running at. They also show how people lose their common sense, say or write just about anything when they are scared by new technology.

"I have travelled the length and breadth of this country and talked with the best people, and I can assure you that data processing is a fad that won't last out the year."

Editor-in-charge of business books for Prentice-Hall, 1957.

You know, I liked you a whole lot more on the Internet

"Not all storage devices are 3.5 or 5.25 inch squares. A third type of storage medium, the CD-ROM, is spherical." — PC Novice.

"Want to trade World War II Japanese army rifle for 386 or stronger." — The Oregon Bulletin.

"Your optional 500-sheet paper tray assembly is covered under your printer's one year warranty or 90 days, whichever is longer." — HP Laserjet 4 manual

"Computer in the future may weigh no more than 1.5 tonnes." — Popular Mechanics, 1949

"For almost 100 years, NEC has been supplying ... personal computers and high-tech electronics throughout the world." — Telcorps Newswire.

"For sale: Computer with medical software. WordPerfect, headlights, esophagoscope, sinus surgery instruments, stainless steel canisters, facial nerve stimulator. ... never opened." — The Carrick Classified

From personal experience in Amman:

— An executive officer in a major bank, in 1988: "When the computer processes Arabic characters, does the hard disk rotate in the other direction?"

— A potential client, in 1989: "I need a computer that runs on software." — I was tempted to offer him one that runs on diesel fuel.

— A client on the phone, last February: "My PC has been hit by a virus, I'm afraid I'll have to replace all the infected hardware."

— A PC with its printer was sent to us by a farmer for repair in 1993. Complaint: "Problem with the mouse." Upon opening the printer we actually found small fragments of white cheese and ... the dead body of a mouse (the real thing, the animal), trapped in the printing mechanism.

Finally if you have Word 6.0 and you want to know why Microsoft actually did take a stand on the Gulf War issue, run the programme, type "Saddam" then see what the spell checker suggests.

HOWLERS

— When complimented on a dress she wears, she says modestly, "Oh, it's really nothing." How true!

— With that dress, it's hard to tell whether she's trying to catch a man or a cold.

— That dress of hers should be called the OPPORTUNITY. There's lots of room at the top.

— She goes out wearing less than her mother wore in bed.

— With that strapless gown, it's obvious she's not interested in shouldering any responsibility.

PUZZLES

A PICTORIAL AVIARY

FROM the six pictures given here the names of five British birds can be formed by arranging certain letters of the objects depicted. Thus: The FIRST bird is made up of all the letters of one object.

The SECOND contains the first two letters of one and the first and last of another object.

The THIRD comprises the first letter of one object, the last three of another and two of yet another.

The FOURTH bird is an arrangement of the first two of one and the last three of another object.

To make up the name of the FIFTH bird take the first two letters of one object and all the letters of another.

Decide first of all what the pictures represent, and then proceed on the stated lines.

Sharing, the greatest gift of all

By Samer Ghaleb Bagaeen

I HAD once read that sometimes it is not the things that happen to us that determine the quality of our life, but our attitude towards such things. And that while we cannot control what other people say and do, we can at least control ourselves.

It is in such situations that it helps to know who we are, what we are capable of, and what we want to do with our lives. At the same time, and recognising that while we have our dreams and the courage to pursue them when we decide we want to, we have also got to respect the right of others to do the same.

All this has to do with a "communication" that is above all about honesty and sincerity.

There are, however, some "communicators" who use their communication skills to conceal their true thoughts from the listener.

One such example is that of a government that can do very little to change things but cannot afford to admit that it can do very little. For if it did, it would make it look as though it can do very little. And a government can only make such an admission when it blames external factors for its failures.

But the government that cannot afford to admit that it can do very little can do one of several things: One, it can say it is worried about something. Two, it can then say it is working out what to do. Three, it can then say it will do something. Finally, it can say it has done something.

At no point need it actually do anything. However, it cannot go on saying those things over and over again without varying the phrasing. For example, another way of saying "we are worried about something" is to say that "this is a subject of concern to us" or "this is a subject of great concern." More ways could include saying that "we have identified this as a subject of genuine concern" or that "the public is quite rightly concerned about this, and so are we."

But there are certain traps that the public relations officer and our prestigious communicator need to be aware of. For example, saying that "this is a subject of legitimate concern and we intend to respond positively to the ground swell of public opinion" is wrong. Wrong because with such a statement comes the promise to do something.

Now, proper ways of saying this include "we are keeping our options open," or "we are monitoring the situation carefully," or even "we are listening carefully to what you are saying."

"Listen" and "carefully" are good words. Putting those in a phrase suggests the speaker is in fact listening carefully. He or she is not of course. They are too busy talking carefully. All because careless talk costs jobs.

Carelessness can also cost you a relationship because the breakdown of communications within a relationship can cause it to fail. But being able to communicate with a partner and to be willing to be honest and sincere can, and most certainly will, pull such a relationship out of trouble, and eventually make it stronger than it ever was at any other time.

And when something like this happens, you are bound to end up happier, stronger and more mature as a person. And once you learn to trust, to hope and to persevere, a love that is both patient and kind will forever protect you.

Tobacco under fire — An industry at the crossroads

By Jay Root
Agence France Presse

WINSTON-SALEM, North Carolina — There is trouble on tobacco road.

U.S. cigarette makers face the multiple threats of unprecedented government regulation, criminal investigations, multibillion dollar lawsuits and an ever-shrinking domestic clientele.

Tobacco farmers fear their centuries-old heritage will vanish. Politicians pro and con are bracing for war. Wall Street is jittery.

And the estimated 47 million American smokers, unwilling or unable to quit inhaling a product the government blames for 419,000 deaths each year, have become social outcasts.

"It's communism," shrieked Bennie Thomas, a two-pack-a-day construction worker forced to smoke outdoors due to a local law in nearby Durham. "If a man wants to smoke, that's his business."

Such sentiments are common in North Carolina, the largest producer of tobacco in the United States and home to RJ Reynolds tobacco company, maker of Winston, Salem and Camel cigarettes.

Tobacco, steeped in tradition, is embedded in U.S. history and culture, and cigarette makers remain a cornerstone of American enterprise.

But for many doctors and anti-smoking activists, any curbs on the world's most dangerous consumer product would be a blessing.

To be sure, any talk of industry-wide demise is premature.

Tobacco has been down before, and global sales remain strong.

But there are cracks in the armour. U.S. President Bill Clinton, armed with data showing a sharp rise in teen smoking, declared war on the industry when in 1995 his administration proposed to regulate cigarettes as drugs. A final decision is pending.

Meantime, the Liggett Group, maker of Chesterfield cigarettes, shocked the industry when it agreed to settle with five of the nine states now suing to recoup the costs of treating sick smokers.

No company had ever agreed, or been forced, to pay a penny in smoking injury awards.

Compounding the industry's headaches are several ongoing criminal probes, at least one relating to the tobacco executives themselves.

A grand jury is looking into whether several top executives lied when they testified before a panel of Congress in 1994 that nicotine is not addictive. Secret documents have shown the companies' own researchers found nicotine to be addictive.

But perhaps the biggest threat facing the tobacco industry now is Mr.

Clinton's proposal. But it had one huge caveat: No FDA control. The Clinton administration described the offer as inadequate.

While there is at least some common ground on the evils of teen smoking, the companies part company with government on the overwhelming case against tobacco's dangers.

A federal court recently threw out a lawsuit filed on behalf of virtually every U.S. smoker claiming tobacco-related injuries. The plaintiffs are now pressing ahead in state courts across the nation.

Meanwhile, tobacco firms are reaping the fruits of their successful lobbying effort on U.S. trade policy, which has contributed to booming sales abroad. Philip Morris first-quarter profits amounted to $1.6 billion, up 14.8 per cent from a year earlier, with profits equally higher from tobacco sales.

Alan Blum, head of the renowned Doctor's Ought to Care (DOC) anti-tobacco group, is no fan of the tobacco companies. But he acknowledges that while anti-smoking forces continue to hound them, their profits continue to soar.

"These companies are not on the ropes," he said, pointing to Philip Morris' record profit levels. "If I had no scruples, I would invest in the tobacco industry."

Despite their troubles, the news is not all bad for the tobacco titans.

U.S. approves device to treat enlarged prostates

WASHINGTON (R) — A computer-controlled device that destroys excess prostate tissue with microwave heat was approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

Also, a researcher announced results of a Veterans' Administration study showing that of two common drugs used to treat enlarged prostates, one is significantly better, with the other having little benefit.

Enlarged prostate, medically known as benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH), affects more than 50 per cent of men aged 60 or older and causes a gradual increase in frequent, difficult urination, sometimes leading to urinary tract damage.

The FDA said the procedure using the device made by Edap Technomed, a private French firm, takes one hour and can be done on an outpatient basis with local anaesthetic.

The FDA said drugs give only modest relief while surgery, still the most effective treatment, required anaesthesia and could result in blood loss, impotence and other complications.

It added that because of the design of the device, it would be limited for use on patients with a medium-sized prostate.

"This device provides another alternative for men who are unable or do not wish to have surgery for enlarged prostate," FDA Commissioner David Kessler said. "While not a cure, it effectively treats the symptoms of BPH."

Treatment with the device, the FDA said, had been shown to be safe and effective, although it did not correct the problems of incomplete emptying of the bladder and weak urinary stream.

Edap Technomed Group, the firm's unit in Cambridge, Massachusetts, tested the device on 375 men over 45 at seven medical centres in the United States and Europe, the FDA said. It said such urinary symptoms as urgency, frequency, straining and intermittent flow improved in 75 per cent of patients.

The FDA said a follow-up four years later showed the improvement continued in about half the patients the other half needed treatment again with the device or drugs or surgery at some time during the four years.

In the Veterans Administration comparative study, one of two common drugs used to treat enlarged prostates was clearly shown to be better than the other at relieving symptoms, a U.S. researcher said.

The study found that Terazosin, marketed under the product name Hytrin, was "significantly" more effective than the placebo. Meanwhile, the drug Finasteride, marketed as Proscar, had virtually identical results to the placebo.

The results of the study were released at the American Urological Association's annual meeting in Orlando, Florida.

The study's principal investigator, Dr. Herh Lepor, chairman of the Department of Urology at New York University, said the study essentially confirmed the effectiveness of Terazosin but was unable to duplicate the benefits of Finasteride shown in other studies.

Nuclear medicine aids breast cancer diagnosis — experts

DENVER (R) — Nuclear medicine can help diagnose two of the greatest health risks to women, breast cancer and heart disease, experts in the field told a conference recently.

"Nuclear medicine offers painless, safe, accurate and cost-effective prognostic, diagnostic and therapeutic approaches," said Naomi Alazraki, co-director of the Division of Nuclear Medicine at Emory University Hospital in Atlanta.

Nuclear medicine uses very small amounts of radioactive substances. "No more than perhaps one to three or four times the radiation you get from living on Earth in Denver for one year," said Dr. Alazraki.

About 7,000 nuclear medicine and health care professionals are attending the annual society of nuclear medicine's 43rd annual meeting here.

Scientists at the conference will present papers on advances in diagnosing breast cancer and on distinguishing malignant from benign tumours.

The procedure, called scintimammography, uses nuclear medicine to make pictures of the breast and is being studied as a complement to standard mammography to help detect cancer when mammography results are inconclusive. The process is awaiting approval by the Food and Drug Administration.

Breast cancer is the most common form of cancer in American women, with an estimated 2.6 million living with the disease. About half of these women do not know it, Dr. Alazraki said.

Nuclear medicine can also help detect heart disease, which is expected to kill half a million women this year.

by aiding doctors in determining which women are at high, intermediate or low risk for a future heart attack or death.

Nuclear medicine heart scans, which provide three-dimensional pictures of the heart, show areas where blood flow is reduced, indicating heart disease, said Douglas Miller, a cardiologist and nuclear medicine physician at the St. Louis University Health Sciences Centre.

Nuclear medicine can also make a contribution in this era of cost consciousness by better identifying those who do not need expensive medical care, Dr. Miller said.

"Those medical resources can then be appropriately re-directed in the direction of the higher risk patients who benefit from high-risk care," he said.

Pneumonia bacteria 'may be linked' to coronary diseases

WASHINGTON (AFP) — A tiny bacteria that causes pneumonia may play a key role in atherosclerosis, the underlying cause of nearly half the deaths in the United States.

Atherosclerosis of the coronary arteries consists of an accumulation of plaque on the artery walls that reduces the blood flow or cuts it off altogether.

The degenerative coronary obstruction can cause pectoral angina or heart attack.

A study published in the June issue of the Journal of the American College of Cardiology shows that chlamydia pneumoniae, a bacteria discovered a few years ago, has been found in coronary arteries with atherosclerosis.

The bacteria, barely detectable even by powerful microscopes, is not present in coronary arteries without atherosclerosis, according to the study.

Chlamydiae are urogenital and pulmonary infection agents.

"If (the study) is true and chlamydia really causes atherosclerosis, then this may have tremendous implications," said Joseph Mubalestein, a co-author of the study and an assistant professor of medicine at LDS Hospital, Salt Lake City, Utah.

The link between the bacteria and atherosclerosis was discovered by studying plaque specimens from patients with coronary artery disease. Chlamydia was found in 79 per cent of 90 specimens, as compared with only 4 per cent in 24 nonatherosclerotic pathology specimens, according to the study.

"This could create a whole new paradigm of atherosclerosis," said Jeffrey Anderson, the senior researcher of the Utah team and the chief of cardiology at LDS Hospital. "It could influence how we look at coronary disease, not just as a degenerative disease but as a disease in some cases initiated by an infectious process," he said.

But the researchers also conceded chlamydia may be only "an innocent bystander" that grows in atherosclerotic plaque but does not contribute to the development of atherosclerosis.

Young children in U.S. show strong immunity to polio virus

WASHINGTON (AFP) — Researchers have found high levels of immunity to the polio virus among young children but that live vaccines offered little protection from secondary spread, the Journal of the American Medical Association said.

Researchers from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) in Atlanta, Georgia said a study they conducted in two U.S. cities showed that "seroprevalence of antibodies against all three polio types in high-risk populations ... was generally high, approximating or exceeding 90 per cent by 24-35 months of age."

The researchers tested blood samples of 526 children aged 12 to 47 months.

They said in the study that even though the virus spread rapidly in Houston, Texas and Detroit, Michigan, during the past decade "these levels of immunity were probably high enough to prevent subsequent spread."

Testing of a separate group of samples showed that 9-18 per cent of 114 unvaccinated children were immune to the polio polioviruses type one and two and 29-42 per cent were immune to type three.

The researchers suggested the unvaccinated children became immune through secondary infection from children who had been given an attenuated live oral poliovirus vaccine (OPV), which has been used in the United States since the early 1960's.

William Foege of the task force for child survival said the study made a case for using inactivated polio vaccines in the United States, particularly since the risk of OPV-associated paralysis "looms much larger in the absence of a secondary benefit of OPV."

In an editorial published with the study, Dr. Foege also said global eradication of polio could be achieved by 2000.

Capturing 'the sense of the moment'

By Mahmoud I. Mufti

THERE IS a popular belief in the world of professional photography that everything is squarely in terms of the subject matter, with the photographer simply acting as the capturer of an instant here, a moment there. This is valid, and certainly applies in many cases.

However, it is also true, as illustrated in the works of American fine art photographer George Vass, that the photographer dictates his terms and preferences on the subject matter. The latter can vary from random people going about their daily business, to sheep awaiting their impending slaughter in the Eid, to (even) the beginnings of a twister or sandstorm in Wadi Rum. The artist achieves this in large part by the judicious exercise of patience, a deep-rooted sense of documentary philosophy and perhaps most pertinent of all, a "sense of the moment."

In his exercise of the latter, Mr. Vass awaits the very moment in the scene that triggers the exact nature and threshold of response in him. When this happens, he shoots. But this is only one aspect of his photographic methodology. There are other instances when he shoots a the detection and "homolog" on natural parallels. One son capitalises on literal parallels in terms of juxtaposition (involving, for instance, a street side-rail and overhead signboard, on the one hand, or a farmyard brick wall and a horizontally-outstretched retaining chain, on the other hand).

The potential of infinite shadows and the kindred element of contrasting hues in any given scene are likewise capitalised upon by the artist through the selection of the optimal time of day as well as the skillful manipulation of the numerous variables during the casting and composition processes. This conglomeration of possibilities arms the artist with the requisite aesthetic material from which to achieve balance, once again, albeit through the masterful manipulation of shadows. Accordingly, they (the shadows and shades) are made to interplay with each other in such a manner that they attain a sense of the parallel. But because they are shadows and not solid objects, the parallels and balance achieved by them — rather, through them — is of the undisciplined, though comfortable and spiritual sort.

The works of George Vass are strictly in black and white, with every possible shade of gray in between endowing the work with all the diminutive details and nuances offered by colour photography, though, as is inevitable in black and white, the character and atmosphere are entirely different. They evoke the past without ringing with anachronism. Interestingly, they are actually all taken recently and are contemporary in that sense. Yet the identity that berobes them is one similar to turn-of-the-century classic photographs, in as much as the latter are able to generate that special enduring allure so hard to achieve these days.

The viewer will not notice any sense of novelty surrounding these works. They lack that halo of novelty normally associated with explorers' or travellers' pictures. Instead, they stand for a far deeper understanding of, and sensitivity to, local Arab culture and are consequently far less transient.

The artist was pressed further on this point. He expounded that "they (the works) symbolise something and have feelings in them. The work I do is 'everyday life', and you find symbols and mystery in it — like a verse or an individual poem. These scenes do not represent travel photography. They're not to show you how people in Jordan, the West Bank or Jerusalem live: They are showing my (own personal) reaction to that. They are showing what made me attracted to them (the scenes) and why they moved me to take these (particular shots). Otherwise, it would be travel photography, involving just going round with the camera and taking pictures of coffee tables."

One particular shot depicts a tall, thin scraggly man in one corner of the photograph, heavily shadowed and accordingly mysterious and even sinister. He is standing there perfectly still, with the demeanor of someone preoccupied with protecting a hypothetical hidden bookstand or some other stand of sellables from pilfering hands, while awaiting to ensnare an unsuspecting buyer with an irresistible deal. The contrast in the picture (and consequently the balance) is not restricted to the element of shades and shadows, but is also manifest in the stillness of the man as compared to the hurried gaits of bypassers.

At the risk of reading too much into the works, one cannot help observing that the general theme common to most of the pictures seems to be the study of the interrelationship between photography as art and the socio-economic conditions (of people and settings depicted). None of the pictures narrate wealthy people or affluent neighbourhoods. This is understandable, when bearing in mind what the artist said earlier, that the scenes are reflective of the attraction (and hence the relevance) that these themes were able to draw from their framer; the artist. The preference is thus personal and totally subjective: He shoots what touches him to the core of his being. Rich people, plush villas and cars simply did not move him in the slightest.

It could well be appropriate at this juncture to explore what was observed of the works of prominent portrait photographer, August Sander. A book featuring his works, entitled Citizens of the Twentieth Century: Portrait Photographs 1892-1952, includes in its preface (by Gunther Sander), a potential parallel between the works of the two artists. "Sander also developed a new awareness of the problematic relationship between art and economic conditions. However, he tended to see this problem from a somewhat antiquated point of view: his basic demand that the artist must decide whether to serve cultural or market exigencies was based upon the belief that the two were distinct entities and that 'culture' could and should remain independent of economic factors. These reflections coincided with his belief that he could, through his creative work, stand apart from history and society. From that neutral ground he believed he would be able to impartially 'hold a mirror' up to people and produce an 'objective' picture of the social panorama before him... Without realising it, he operated from a specific social position which prescribed for him a definitely partisan position."

This quote is not intended to allude to partisanship on the part of artist George Vass in as much as it does incoincidentally draw parallels between the sense of mission, through photography, that characterises the two individuals in their separate and slightly different realms.

Reflecting on his artistic philosophy, the artist says: "Life is made up of tiny, seemingly insignificant moments which are more often than not overlooked. From time immemorial, the people along the banks of the Jordan have witnessed the passage of history, cultures and events. Against this tapestry of sometimes dramatic episodes they continue to follow the flow of everyday life. This is what I see."

The various scenes featured in the exhibit are inclusive of

RENDEZVOUS WITH ART

Young girls rushing home to the iftar in Jerusalem shots of people in the streets of downtown Amman, Jerash, Irbid (among other places) as well as of the old cossy alleys and holy places of Jerusalem and the West Bank in general. People rushing home minutes before the Iftar in Ramadan are shown, with fast-food street vendors attempting to persuade them to improve their dinner prospects by purchasing some of their freshly baked or fried pastries.

A profile shot of a public transport bus reveals the glum faces of two young mothers, children-in-laps, one of whom is looking out into infinity. The prevalent expression is not one of obvious despair as it is a reflection of resignation and an — albeit dignified — submission to mundane daily routine. The artist is captivated by the atmosphere in this scene. And so is the viewer, especially upon reading the embossed stop-over names of the bus's travel route: "Al Wthdal : The Sharq Al Awsat : Hiteen (formerly Schneller) Community College" (meticulously hand-painted along the length of the bus). The artist did not know that these destinations represent residential and work places for large numbers of the victims of the Palestinian diaspora. This is all the more interesting in the context of an American photographer's reaction to and recognition of the inherent sense of frustration in these people's faces without even knowing their troubled recent history — just their socio-economic predicament.

Describing his work, the artist says that: "With my camera, I capture moments that we pass by without a second glance. Moments that make up our daily lives. The approach I use is called 'High and Low', where the low, inconsequential events transcend to a high artistic level when captured the instant they are created."

It is doubtful that the women in the bus feel any sense of art regarding their situation, or indeed the street vendors depicted in Jerusalem's stone-tiled alleys as they attempt to eke out a living. But it has also got to be true that it is through artistic mediums, such as this philosophical form of photography, that the multitude of issues and human dilemmas most effectively reach out and touch humankind.

The exhibition, Passage Across the Jordan, consisting of 44 works, runs until June 23, 1996, at the American Centre Exhibition Hall, The American Embassy — Abdoun. Each print is one of ten worldwide. George Vass is an internationally acclaimed photographer who has exhibited extensively in the United States and Europe.

An old man turned away from his West Bank hometown scene from a moving car, capturing the moment off guard, with all its delights and oddities.

The exhibit consists of 44 photographs taken in Jordan, Jerusalem and the West Bank. "They reflect the lives of people along the banks of the Jordan River who have witnessed the passage of history, cultures and events," according to a press release from the United States Information Service.

At first glance, the viewer seems justified in feeling disconcerted with a lot of the exhibited works; blurriness abounds in many of the pictures. One wonders how a Leica and 35mm format in the hands of photographic master could produce jitters like this. "Balance is very important in the works," explains Mr. Vass, adding that "I often purposely chose to make the image blurred in one part of the picture, since its natural angularity would not harmonise — or balance — with a relatively vague object somewhere else (in the frame)." Yet the effect, even though forced, is never contrived.

Juliette Binoche gets passionate in Horseman On The Roof

By Michael Warren
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Actress and model Juliette Binoche is describing the glorious landscapes she fell in love with in the south of France when she stops in mid-sentence and dashes to the window.

"Look at that! Look at that bird!" she says, her dark eyes growing wide at the sight of a seagull gliding high above Manhattan's Upper East Side. "It's amazing, because you feel there's nothing can happen here. All you see is airplanes..."

After working in Provence and Tuscany in her last two films, Horseman, On The Roof and The English Patient, this devoted Parisienne says she's had enough of urban life. She's flying back tonight to Paris, where she's trading in her cramped place in Montmartre for a house with a garden.

"I need to plant things and see them growing and see the seasons passing," explains Binoche. "Then you feel life, you feel part of the earth. Not like here."

Lately, Binoche can afford to get her thumbs dirty. A modelling contract with Lancome pays her bills, and her schedule is unexpectedly free after she was booted in March from the starring role in Lucie Aubrac, a film about a heroine of the French resistance. Binoche wanted a realistic portrayal of Aubrac's life; director Claude Berri wanted more romance. Berri won.

Aubrac is "an amazing woman," she says, "and I was very close to her. That's why it probably bothered the director. Because, to me, the movie was about her, and for her and her husband. And I think the director didn't really care about her opinion. For me, that was crucial."

Such impertinence. Berri, who directed Germinal, is a top director in France. But in almost 20 films, Binoche has enjoyed having creative input with Louis Malle, Jean-Luc Godard, Krzysztof Kieslowski, Leos Carax, Mike Figgis, Jean-Paul Rappeneau and Anthony Minghella.

Such give and take on the set is vital, she says. "It's a way to be intelligent."

A petite brunette with freckles and a wide, enchanting smile, this 32-year-old actress has a natural and yet sophisticated beauty, something like Holly Golightly with a PhD. She laughs often, appears to be happy and well-centred, and yet there is much about her life that she won't reveal — such as the identity of the father of her 2-year-old son, Raphael.

"I don't talk about my private life," she says flatly. "I don't care about what people think I am because I know what I am, and so it doesn't matter to me."

Binoche has been in the public eye for years. The daughter of a director and drama teacher, she studied theatre at the Paris Conservatoire and lived for much of her 20s with Carax, who directed her in The Night Is Young and Lovers Of The Pont Neuf.

But she remains mysterious, not unlike many of her characters: Enigmatic women whose beauty goes hand-in-hand with inner strength.

"Most of the time I've been playing survivors. It's resistance I would call it. Resisting. In The Horseman, it has to do with resisting passion, and feelings and love. But I don't think she's cold inside. I tell you, I think she's more than hot; she's boiling inside of her."

In The Horseman, Binoche plays Pauline De Theus, a married French aristocrat who survives a cholera epidemic and political chaos after the fall of Napoleon, struggling all the while to avoid falling in love with the brash young Italian revolutionary who demands to be her escort.

Based on a novel by Jean Giono, it is an epic film, and France's most expensive at $35 million, involving more than 100 roles and 45 different locations across the south of France. But the incendiary centre of the story is the unspoken, unconsummated attraction between Pauline and her dashing Carbonaro, played by Olivier Martinez.

Pauline is a departure from the chilly, distant characters Binoche played in Malle's Damage and Kieslowski's Blue, but the actress is unconcerned about her image when it comes to choosing roles.

"The most important thing is that the story tell something and that the director is someone I respect and I can share something with," she says.

Binoche praised Rappeneau for being faithful to Giono's vision of chivalry, honour and a pastoral world where trees, horses and other living things have spiritual, almost human qualities.

She also had high praise for Minghella, the director of Truly, Madly, Deeply, who brought Binoche and Ralph Fiennes to Italy last year for The English Patient, a film based on the book by Michael Ondaatje.

"He wanted me to get into areas I'd never been in and that's the most generous thing you can expect from a director," she says.

After nerve-racking experiences with English-language coaches before and during the filming of Damage, Wuthering Heights and The Unbearable Lightness Of Being, Binoche had been concerned about mastering the accent of a Canadian nurse. But she says Minghella encouraged her to speak naturally — and developed such a bond with her that speech became unnecessary.

"He would just move his arms like this," she says, flapping like a swan, "and instead of saying with words, it was just, 'now, fly!' before a take. ... For me it was like, 'oh my God, I'm going to fall down,' and he freed me."

The experience was so enjoyable that Binoche has no desire to jump into another movie. The modelling contract has bought her time to be with her son and work in her garden until the next great story comes along.

"I'm telling stories," she says. "And what I'd like is that people after they see the movie can think about it and ask questions amongst themselves and maybe find answers or other questions. It's not about me. It's about the characters I'm playing."

Changes at Polish television cause alarm

By Anthony Barker
Reuters

WARSAW — Alarm over the independence of Polish public television, the young democracy's main provider of news, is gripping the country's media and reached as far as Washington.

Last month the television's President Wieslaw Walendziak quit, alleging political pressure, and was replaced by a member of the Peasant Party, smaller partner in the ruling coalition dominated by former Communists now turned Social Democrats.

The new chief Ryszard Miazek ousted the head of the main evening news programme and was quoted in newspapers as saying television journalists had to be polite to politicians, avoid expressing opinions and strictly follow the management's line.

Various journalists reacted with horror to his reported comments and Washington officials asked what they meant for the health of democratic institutions Poland will have to prove before U.S. legislators approve its NATO entry.

Foreign Minister Dariusz Rosati returned from talks with top U.S. officials saying: "I heard concerns that the new television leadership might conduct a purge of staff."

Mr. Miazek, 51, is indignant over what he says is a misunderstanding or wilful misrepresentation of his views, motivated in part by prejudice over his peasant affiliations.

"I have never said one cannot pose tough questions or criticise a politician," said Mr. Miazek, a former farming journalist and spokesman for the peasant party chief, who was until now on the watchdog council overseeing broadcasting.

He said public television, serving society at large, did not have the latitude of papers serving specific readerships.

But he told Reuters his goal was merely to implement ethics like those of the British Broadcasting Corporation, to prevent partisan journalism.

"The most controversial view I expressed was the aim of linking the principle of inquisitiveness with the courtesy that should accompany discussion," he said, adding that maybe the row arose because he was setting standards too high.

Although Mr. Miazek insists his guidelines apply to politicians of all hues, critics say that being nice to them would favour parties in power, who must answer for actual policies.

Public television's role is vital because its two channels are by far Poland's biggest providers of news and current affairs, while the sole private nationwide channel, Polsat, is not yet widely seen as a serious alternative in this area.

Before the 1989 fall of communism, state television was controlled totally by official propagandists and in 1992 Poland introduced new rules to safeguard its independence.

Mr. Walendziak, as first president of the reformed TVP SA, brought in a generation of youthful journalists — nicknamed "Pampers" after a brand of babies' nappies — who prided themselves on being as hard-hitting as the newly-free press.

Members of the coalition often alleged hostile bias under Mr. Walendziak and did not hide their satisfaction when he quit.

Now some commentators see the dominant ex-Communist Democratic Left Alliance (SLD) as the hand behind Mr. Miazek's election by the television's supervisory board — a body that largely reflects the political line-up in parliament.

"I am sure the SLD is behind the decision to recall me," said Adam Pieczynski, sacked head of the Channel One's mid-evening flagship news programme Mr. Wiadomosci, which is watched by 12-15 million viewers.

He predicted that Mr. Miazek would make controversial changes, before next year's parliamentary polls, then be replaced by a slicker television professional linked to the SLD.

Mr. Pieczynski told Reuters he did not expect a return to crude propaganda or a sudden purge of staff, although he saw signs that politicians were already having an easier time talking on television without troublesome questioning by journalists.

He said the chief danger was that management of television and the council that oversees broadcasting would continue to be fought over by each political grouping that won power.

"The problem is that every successive coalition will want to be in the same way, including the right," he said.

He also argued that if a new regional television licence, due to be allocated soon and form the basis of a future independent system, went to a bidder linked with the SLD, this would be an ominous sign.

But government spokeswoman Aleksandra Jakubowska, who has repeatedly complained over TV coverage, denied that the changes at public television heralded control by the coalition.

"I don't believe television's independence was based on two people, President Walendziak and Mr. Pieczynski," she said.

Boleslaw Sulik, head of the watchdog Broadcasting Council, is calm about prospects for television's independence, saying they were better than in other former Soviet Bloc states.

He said the key issue was that changes in its management had been carried out by the proper procedures, despite signs ruling politicians had wanted at one stage to circumvent them.

"Now we must judge it on its record," Mr. Sulik said.

Chinese film industry told to get rolling

BEIJING (AFP) — Chinese President Jiang Zemin has made his latest foray into the country's cultural sector, calling on the film industry to produce "refined" movies that reflect China's reform and modernisation programme.

"This is the main tune that the country's literature and art circles, including the film sector, should advocate and observe," Mr. Jiang was quoted as saying by the People's Daily.

Mr. Jiang made his remarks during a recent visit to the August 1 Film Studio — the sole movie wing of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) that is best known for churning out epic war features.

Mr. Jiang, who also heads the Communist Party and the all-powerful Central Military Commission, urged filmmakers to produce "more refined" movies that would help promote the domestic industry while at the same time espousing socialist values.

"We should give a big push to our socialist culture and ideology while doing a good job of our material civilisation. This is our resolute policy," Mr. Jiang said.

China's state-run film industry, dogged by poor quality productions, has been in free fall since 1979, with box office takings plunging from 29.3 billion yuan ($3.4 billion) to 9.5 billion yuan in 1993.

Dissatisfaction with the quality of domestic productions as well as their outdated propaganda content has been reflected in the popularity of foreign blockbuster imports, such as The Fugitive, True Lies and Bridges Over Madison County.

Nevertheless, Mr. Jiang, while admitting the need for "new initiatives and ideas," made it clear that, from the August 1 Studio at least, the party expected ideologically correct productions.

The studio should "make more good military films in an effort to uphold patriotism and revolutionary heroism," Mr. Jiang said.

Fresh excavations clarify more aspects of Ridge Church at Petra

By Rami G. Khouri
Special to the Jordan Times

A third, one-week-long season of excavations at a Byzantine church in Petra has clarified more of the architectural history of the structure, while also possibly offering tantalising glimpses of medieval defensive systems based on cutting off access routes into the city-centre. The excavation of the Ridge Church at Petra, directed by Dr Patricia M. Bikai of the American Centre of Oriental Research (ACOR) in Amman, has also uncovered evidence of a Roman period history of Petra.

The Ridge Church can only be roughly dated to the 5th-6th centuries AD, due to the paucity of excavated material remains. It is located at the north-western edge of the Byzantine town, about 160 metres northwest of the Petra Church (the one with the splendid mosaic floor and rare papyrus scrolls, excavated and restored in recent years by an ACOR team). Due to erosion, possible deliberate dismantling, or reuse of its stones elsewhere, all the church's walls and other standing structures have disappeared, leaving only the foundation remains.

This year's excavations clarified the architectural design of this typical Byzantine church, which had a central nave ending in an apse flanked by two side aisles. The main church body measures 18 x 13.5 metres, and has a 3-metre-deep narthex or portico along its west side. A rock-cut and fully plastered cistern was dug out beneath the western end of the nave. The column bases, drums and capitals in the church were reused from earlier Nabataean/Roman buildings.

Matching design with terrain

This year's excavation provided further confirmation of how the architect had to reconcile the layout of the church with the hilly terrain at his disposal, including bulging bits of bedrock. The two aisles are of different widths, and at the end of the northern aisle the problem of rising bedrock was solved by inserting steps between the aisle proper and the apse.

The pastophorium (the squarish room at the end of the aisle, flanking the main apse). The chancel area, raised above the east end of the nave, was remodelled in antiquity and at one point was covered in mosaics of simple, large white cubes, perhaps with some coloured patterns. The 1995 dig produced more firm evidence for glass and stone wall mosaics inside the church.

Two column bases in the narthex, at the west end of the church, helped support the narthex roof. Three steps lead down from the narthex to the lower courtyard, to the west side of which the excavators found a 2 x 2-metre area of burnt material, including some nails and pieces of lead.

(One of the narthex steps, uncovered in 1995, was made of an upside down stone with a fragmentary Latin inscription, now being studied by Zbigniew T. Fiema. The relatively rare use of Latin in ancient Petra confirms the "official" nature of the inscription and its relatively early date — not later than the 3rd century AD, according to Mr Fiema. The commemorative text may have been attached to a statue or some other monument. It mentions a well known military unit of the Roman army, the Ala II Ulpia Auraniana, an army regiment that was based in Cappadocia, now in modern Turkey; it may commemorate a military commander already known from other sources, and who may have been a native of Petra who had risen in the ranks and once served in Cappadocia.)

Reused Nabataean designs

The lower courtyard of the church was cleared this year to reveal two doors on the south and west sides. Two column bases and drums on stylobates, and their original positions, and nearly 100 architectural fragments were recovered from this area, including eight parts of engaged column bases and capitals, and part of a carved Nabataean entablature with triglyphs and circles in the metopes (the common ancient decorative pattern of alternating circles and three vertical lines).

These pieces may suggest that engaged columns framed a doorway or niche over which stood the entablature, in the unexcavated western part of the lower courtyard. Dr Bikai told the Jordan Times in a recent interview to Amman. These architectural elements are thought to date from the 1st Century AD, when Nabataean Petra was at its height.

The southern approach to the church was cleared this year and revealed a broad step, leading to the main entrance of the church.

Some of the architectural fragments recovered were found together in a corner of the church, suggesting to Dr Bikai that they were dumped into a natural depression near the stairs in relatively modern times, when farmers levelled the land for agricultural use. This levelling probably destroyed the mosaics of the chancel area.

New inscription fragment

An exciting new find this year was a large fragment of a monumental inscription in Greek letters, with only four letters visible — not quite enough to attempt a reconstruction.

The size of the letters is impressive, each measuring 22 centimetres high, indicating the important (probably imperial) nature of the inscription. The size of the letters may make this the largest known script from ancient Petra.

The 1996 season continues to strengthen Dr Bikai's hypothesis that the church, once it went out of use, was ravaged by deliberate defensive actions by the post-Byzantine residents of Petra. Hundreds of water-washed cobbles found in the northwest corner of the excavated area in 1995 could only have come from the Wadi Abu 'Ullayqa below, she notes, and more such stones were found this year in the northern part of the lower courtyard. Perhaps, she says, the stones and many of the church's now-missing architectural elements were used as missiles against hostile attackers who tried to enter Petra through the wadi — the last defensible entry point into the city from the north.

A glimpse at history?

She quotes local residents of Petra as recounting that from the northern part of the lower courtyard it would be possible to cut the route into Petra through Wadi Abu 'Ullayqa, and also that a similar collection of stones exists at another such strategic site to the east that can cut off the wadi entrance to the city.

"We may be seeing here only the faintest glimpse of an incident or series of incidents during the long dark age of Petra," Dr Bikai said.

"The destruction of the church building thus may have been due to a combination of erosion, deliberate dismantling, and agricultural clearing."

There is evidence that the church was built in more than one stage, and that it may have used walls of buildings from earlier periods.

There are not enough material remains to date the church more precisely than from the 5th-6th centuries AD. The pottery shards collected at the site spanned a very wide time period from the 1st century AD (Nabataean wares) until modern times.

The excavation was sponsored and funded by the American Centre of Oriental Research in Amman. The assistant director was

King meets Clinton today

The U.S. government said on Tuesday it had formally told Congress it intended to supply F-16 warplanes to Jordan and officials said the long-discussed deal was expected to go through by the end of July.

Secretary of State Warren Christopher, standing alongside King Hussein, told reporters: "I'm glad to say in the presence of the King that we have sent the notification with respect to the F-16s to Capitol Hill."

Mr. Christopher said: "That's a very important step in the process and we intend to proceed with that in the customary way."

State Department spokesman Nicholas Burns said the notification was made on June 5. "We would expect that this would go through and that the F-16s would be transferred by this summer. I would think by the end of July," he said.

The move is a formality that gives the legislature a chance to object. But with Israel having already given its support for the deal, Congress is thought unlikely to try to block it.

"We think that those F-16s are an important aspect of the security of Jordan," Mr. Christopher said. "They're really a reflection of what President Clinton has said so many times... and that is for those who have taken the risks for peace, the United States wants to help them and to help them to minimise the risks of peace."

King Hussein has met with U.S. Secretary of Defence William Perry and discussed with him bilateral relations and military cooperation in terms of providing Jordan with its defence needs.

The American side expressed their appreciation for Jordanian army and the role it plays to maintain security and stability, particularly in peacekeeping forces, the Jordan News Agency, Petra, said.

Attending the audience on the Jordanian side were Prime Minister Abdul Karim Kabariti, Royal Court Chief Awn Khasawneh, the King's Military Secretary HRH Prince Talal Ben Mohammed, the King's Adviser for National Security Mustafa Qaisi and Jordan's Ambassador to U.S. Fayed Tarawneh. It was attended on the American side by senior military officials.

Washington is keen to see Jordan play a greater role in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process because it is "the only Arab country which enjoys the confidence of all Israelis whether they are right or left-wing," the official in Amman said.

Recognising the need to win over the King, Likud leader Netanyahu sent one of his top aides to Amman shortly after his May 29 election victory with a message reaffirming his commitment to peace.

King Hussein will be the first Arab leader to meet with Mr. Clinton, who implicitly backed Mr. Peres to stay on as Israel's prime minister, since Mr. Netanyahu's shock victory.

Mr. Clinton will also have a chance to judge for himself when he meets with the Likud leader for talks tentatively scheduled for the end of the month in Washington.

The award is given to an individual or group which has, in the words of the prize announcement, "demonstrated leadership and vision in the pursuit of liberty of conscience or freedom from oppression, ignorance, or deprivation."

Previous winners have included South African President F.W. de Klerk and African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela in 1993. Czech President Vaclav Havel in 1994 and United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Sadako Ogata in 1995.

Ekeus: Iraq may be hiding arms

Deputy Prime Minister Tareq Aziz said Baghdad allowed a U.N. team Tuesday to inspect six installations in the Abu Gharib region and we have prevented them from visiting two others belonging to the Republican Guards for security reasons."

Since March the United Nations had "been pretending to search for something hidden and each time their inspection has failed to achieve anything," he said, quoted by the official agency INA. "But they keep coming back and for some time they have wanted to provoke us by trying to gain access to sensitive areas, he charged.

"We did not bar them access because we have something to hide, as the experts are pretending, but because these are sites important to our security," he said.

"It is our right not to permit access to sites linked to our sovereignty to foreigners from countries hostile to Iraq."

Mr. Aziz said Iraq's permanent U.N. representative, Nizar Humdun, had proposed to Security Council president Egypt to "send a special delegation to Baghdad or permanent council members and the presidency to inspect all installations that UNSCOM suspects of containing hidden products or documents."

"We want the permanent members of the Security Council to intervene to certify that we have nothing to hide and that we are respecting our commitments."

A U.N. spokesman said meanwhile the international community hopes that an Iraq-U.N. oil-for-food deal will not be affected by the current standoffs between Iraqi authorities and U.N. inspectors.

U.N. spokesman Ahmad Fawzi commented at a news briefing that the latest standoffs in Iraq came at "a very sensitive time in relations between the U.N. and Iraq."

"The international community is very concerned that it does not affect the recently concluded MoU with Iraq."

Iraqi and U.N. negotiators on May 20 signed a memorandum of understanding (MoU) enabling Iraq to resume limited oil exports in return for humanitarian supplies to help ease the suffering of the sanctions-hit Iraqi people.

Likud opens line for talks ment faxed to news organisations.

The outgoing Labour government asked foreign diplomats not to visit the Orient House, but stopped short of barring such contacts.

The Netanyahu communiqué also called on foreign diplomats "to act responsibly during this period of transition, before the formation of the new government, and not to engage in activities which could endanger the peace process."

The statement was prompted by Tuesday night's meeting at the Orient House between Mr. Hussein and two consuls representing Western governments, including the United States.

Mr. Netanyahu and Likud view the Orient House as a threat to Israeli claims of "sovereignty" over all of Jerusalem.

The United States on Tuesday strongly defended Israel's right to delay redeploying troops from Hebron under the peace deal signed with the Palestinians.

"We've all got to live in the real world... The real world is there's been a democratic election (in Israel)... It is rational and reasonable to give the new prime minister, an elected prime minister, some time to form a government. And we're not going to try to hasten that pace," State Department spokesman Nicholas Burns told reporters.

Under the peace accord signed with PLO last September, Israel was to redeploy its troops from Hebron, the last of seven West Bank cities affected by June 12.

After his election defeat, Mr. Peres said he would leave the task to the new Israeli leader.

At a news briefing, Mr. Burns deflected questions about the impact and precedent set by discarding deadline in the peace agreement. Even if Mr. Netanyahu took the full 45 days allotted to form a government, Mr. Burns said, "We're not going to be critical... We ought to all just sit back, be patient, think about other things and we'll get back to this when the government's formed."

Israel's internal intelligence agency has urged Mr. Netanyahu to respect peace commitments to the Palestinians as the only means for curbing nationalist violence, military officials said.

Ami Ayalon, the recently-appointed head of the Shin Bet secret service, met with Mr. Netanyahu the day after his election victory to stress the extensive cooperation which has developed between Israel and the PNA in battling political violence.

Officials said Mr. Ayalon credited the Palestinian police with a major role in preventing further anti-Israeli attacks following a wave of suicide bombings in February and March which killed 58 people in Israel.

He singled out Palestinian help in the May 17 arrest in Hebron of Hassan Salameh, a senior figure in the armed wing of the Islamic Resistance Movement (HAMAS), and said Palestinian police had provided vital intelligence which helped foil numerous attacks.

"This information has become particularly precious since Israeli security can no longer count on intelligence gathering by the network of collaborators it used to have in the occupied territories before the start of Palestinian autonomy," said Yossi Melman, an Israeli anti-terrorism expert.

"Shin Bet recruited huge numbers of informers under the occupation, but that time is past and it has become much more difficult to obtain reliable information or recruit new informers," he told AFP.

and his Likud Party won only 32 seats in the 120-member parliament, compared to 34 for Labour.

Likud officials said they expected Mr. Netanyahu to finish negotiations on forming a coalition government, notably involving religious parties, by early next week.

The new parliament is due to hold its inaugural session on Monday.

Syria seeks growth in GDP to match population boom

LONDON (R) — Syria wants its economic growth to match population growth and has liberalised trade and investment, attracting foreign companies, Selim Yassin, Syria's deputy prime minister for economic affairs said Tuesday.

"The main target is to achieve the highest possible rate of growth in GDP (gross domestic product)," Mr. Yassin told a conference held by the Confederation for British Industry.

"This is needed because of the relatively high rate of population growth, the fair demand for a higher standard of living and to restore equilibrium to the balance of trade, balance of payments and to revenues and expenditures of the budget," he said.

Syria's population of 16 million is growing at an annual rate of 3.5 per cent, among the fastest for developing countries.

In 1995 its GDP was about 125.6 million Syrian pounds ($3 million). GDP has grown annually at an average 7.02 per cent, at constant prices, from 1990 to 1995.

The country is targeting development in agriculture, the oil and gas industry, exploration and exploitation of other natural resources, agricultural processing industries, electrical distribution and telecommunications networks and tourism.

"These opportunities are available for Syrians, Arabs and foreigners as well," said Mr. Yassin.

Syria started moving away from a centrally-planned, government-controlled economy in 1970.

The private sector currently handles 90 per cent of agriculture and 70 per cent of trade. Electricity, ports, water, communications and public transport are run by the government while petrol, cotton and cereals are in the public sector.

Other speakers at the conference also emphasised the need for foreign investment but warned that change is coming slowly in Syria and patience is needed.

It relaxed foreign exchange controls in 1990 and is beginning to pay more attention to banking and finance, particularly from foreigners, said Rabea Shalleh, president of the Union of the Syrian Chambers of Commerce.

The private sector is finding it more difficult to pay the relatively costly interest on loans obtained outside the Syrian official banking system, which has not provided the debt financing required at reasonable terms and conditions, he said.

Political issues, meanwhile, continue to cloud the economic outlook. Both the British ambassador to Syria, Adrian Sindall, and the chief executive of the British Arab Commercial Bank Ltd., Mohammad Fazzani, said the election of right-wing leader Benjamin Netanyahu as Israeli prime minister poses uncertainties.

"The problems confronting us with the peace process do cause us concern," said Mr. Sindall.

Chirac warns of globalisation's 'downside'

GENEVA (R) — French President Jacques Chirac, warning that globalisation of the world economy has its downside, called Tuesday for countries to ensure that benefits filter down to the greatest number of workers.

In a speech to the International Labour Organisation (ILO), he said rules of global trade should reinforce minimum ILO labour standards, such as bans on forced labour and child slavery.

Mr. Chirac said the social dimension of international trade should appear on the agenda of trade ministers who meet at the first ministerial conference of the World Trade Organisation in Singapore in December.

The United States and France are calling for discussion of a "trade and labour" link — the so-called "social clause" — at Singapore, but this is fiercely resisted by the governments of developing countries.

Globalisation was already imposing rapid and painful restructuring in industrialised nations, with an adverse effect on employment, the French president said. In the poorest countries it was liable to lead to greater inequality.

"We must therefore learn to control this process of globalisation better," Mr. Chirac told the ILO annual meeting.

"We must ensure that its benefits reach the greatest number of people, by striving in our own countries to diminish the risk of excluding individuals or sections within our own societies."

In order for globalisation to succeed for the benefit of all — whether in the industrialised countries or in the countries in transition, in the emerging countries or in the very poorest countries — "the economy must be made to serve people and not people the economy," Mr. Chirac declared.

"Above all, we need to invest in people, allowing each and every worker access to life-long vocational training, to enable them to adapt to the rapid far-reaching economic and technological changes which globalisation makes unavoidable," the French president emphasised.

"We need active policies to help the most vulnerable people in society to return to work, by adjusting our tax and welfare systems so as to 'make work pay'," he added.

Ivory Coast out to become economic 'elephant of Africa'

ABIDJAN (AFP) — Ivory Coast is out to emulate the Asian economic "tigers" by becoming the "elephant of Africa," participants at a energy and minerals forum were told here.

Prime Minister Daniel Kablan Duncan said the aim was to diversify beyond the traditional export commodities of coffee and cocoa.

Foreign investors heard that Ivory Coast was rich in minerals, including bauxite, copper, gold, iron, manganese and nickel, while offshore oil fields were showing promise with an output of 30,000 barrels a day.

The port of Abidjan will become the "rotterdam of Africa," authorities said. The government is offering tax and other incentives to attract investors.

B.A., American Airlines form world's largest alliance

LONDON (R) — British Airways (B.A.) and American Airlines announced Tuesday they were forging the world's largest airline alliance in a controversial deal that was almost certain to face regulatory hurdles.

The deal, the biggest of the current wave of link-ups in the airline industry, was also likely to face fierce opposition from other airlines, with B.A.'s archrival Virgin Atlantic Airways leading the charge with a pledge to thwart the plans.

"Our alliance with American Airlines is very good news for consumers, for our employees, for our shareholders, for the communities we serve and for the British aviation industry," B.A. chief executive Bob Ayling said in the announcing statement.

British Airways said the two airlines would coordinate operations of all of B.A.'s 244 flights a week from Britain to its 22 U.S. destinations and all of American's 238 flights a week from seven U.S. airports to 12 European destinations.

They said they would remain separate entities, would not exchange equity stakes and would seek swift progress on the regulatory issues that would need to be cleared up before implementing the proposed alliance.

Don Carty, president of American Airlines, told a conference call for financial analysts that he expected the U.S. departments of justice and transport to approve the scheme and allow an exemption from U.S. anti-trust rules within months.

"I'd be very surprised if the U.S. government couldn't accomplish this within the next couple of months," he said.

B.A.'s Ayling said the two companies had been in contact with the British authorities on the other half of the regulatory equation — the need for a bilateral "open skies" access deal between Britain and the United States — and this had been positive enough for the alliance to be announced.

But he denied that any deal had been sewn up in advance.

"We have been discussing this transaction in confidence with the British government and we have had the indication from them that they would be willing to enter into discussions with the United States government," he affirmed.

Richard Branson, Virgin Atlantic's high-profile owner, immediately pledged to prevent the alliance from going ahead. "We will stop it," Mr. Branson told Reuters in an interview.

He said Virgin would lobby the U.S. Justice Department hard and blitz the media with an advertising campaign if the alliance looked like being waived through by U.S. and U.K. authorities.

"If this British government wants to portray itself as the friend of big business and not the friend of competition, then we will spend a great deal of money making sure the public realise what it's all about," Mr. Branson said.

Mr. Branson kicked off his campaign against the deal by hiring a red double-decker London bus to drive by B.A.'s news conference at London's plush Waldorf Hotel, carrying a brass band and decked with hand-written banners declaring "B.A. no way".

If the B.A.-American alliance is approved, analysts said it will end years of heartache for both carriers in their search for a suitable alliance on the key transatlantic market, where some 70 airlines compete on routes from Europe to the Americas.

Industry executives say the proposed alliance could lead to Britain agreeing to give all U.S. airlines access to London's Heathrow airport, the world's busiest international hub.

Britain and the United States have been trying for the last five years to agree an "open skies" deal to replace their 1977 Bermuda II Air Transport Treaty which heavily restricts which airlines can fly where between the two countries.

The main sticking points have been American Airlines' insistence on getting open access to Heathrow.

British Airways, which has 38 per cent of all runway slots at London's major airport, has insisted open access should be denied unless the United States lifts its 25 per cent limit on foreign ownership of U.S. Airlines.

Travel, tourism offices go to court to demand cancellation of new tourism regulation

THE JORDAN Travel Agents Association (JTAA) has filed a lawsuit at the Higher Court of Justice to annul the new tourism regulation and the "unjust articles" it contains, JATT President Lamie Haddadin said. He said regulation No. 14 (1996) contravened the tourism law No. 20 (1988). He demanded that the articles requiring higher capital and financial guarantees be abolished. According to the new regulation, the Ministry of Tourism is imposing two types of guarantees. The first is to be for JD 25,000 for classification purposes and the second, also for JD 25,000, for those offices which organise tour packages. The ministry is requesting the first guarantee to secure the rights of airline companies and offices as well as the public, Mr. Haddadin said. The JTAA counters that travel agents provide other additional guarantees in excess of the amount requested to airline offices and, as such, the airline companies have their rights guaranteed and there is no need for duplicity on the issue of guarantees.

As for the second guarantee, Mr. Haddadin pointed out that tourism and travel establishments seek to minimise the cost for the tourists coming to visit Jordan and to Jordanians, especially limited-income groups. By demanding an additional guarantee, he argued, "these offices will have additional costs which would result in making the Jordanian market unattractive and uncompetitive from a pricing point of view."

Mr. Haddadin said that there were other articles in the regulation that JTAA is seeking to rewrite. "We are not objecting to the regulation but we want to formulate a new modern one," he said describing the regulation issued by the ministry as a "collective punishment" of tourist offices. He asserted that between 200 and 250 of these offices would be forced to close for not being able to meet the requirements which also stipulate increasing the number of employees and issuing insurance policies to tourists.

According to the JTAA head, the insurance policies is an additional issue. "As long as the tourist is insured on the plane, in the tourist coach and at the hotel, then the tourist office should not be responsible for the personal actions of the tourist." Another point of concern, Mr. Haddadin said, was the attempts by some foreign tourist offices not to settle their financial obligations to the Jordanian offices which incur losses as a result of that.

"To stop some violation a new regulation should be formulated that would have a greater power that the strength of financial guarantees as seen by the ministry. Other penalties are required through formulating a new regulation that would protect the right to everybody," Mr. Haddadin stressed. He said that the association had made many contracts and held many meetings with the officials of the ministry but all the efforts to reach an amicable solution have failed.

For its parts, the ministry has issued warnings to many tourist offices to implement the new regulations or have their offices closed (Al Aswaq).

Asia-Pacific air traffic to hit 200m passengers by 2000

SINGAPORE (AFP) — Air traffic to and from the Asia-Pacific region will reach 200 million passengers by 2000, propelled by liberalisation of air transport and development of new airports, a report has said.

Demand for air transport in the region is growing faster than in any other part of the world on the back of its rapid economic growth, said the report prepared by the International Air Transport Association (IATA).

Asia-Pacific passenger traffic grew at an average 10.3 per cent per annum between 1985 and 1993, reaching 112 million, or 35.3 per cent of the world total, said the report, entitled: Asia-Pacific Air Traffic Growth and Constraints.

The number of passengers travelling in and from the region is forecast to grow by 8.6 per cent a year from 1993 to 2000, reaching 200 million, or 41.2 per cent of the worldwide scheduled international air traffic, the report said.

It forecast a further 7.1 per cent growth in Asia-Pacific traffic between 2000 and 2010, reaching 398 million, or 50.5 per cent of the world total.

IATA had prepared the report for the air transport action group comprising more than 90 airlines, aircraft manufacturers, airport operators, travel agents, consumer associations and other travel-related groups.

Sonics tired of character question

Bulls could wrap up NBA title today

SEATTLE (R) — The Seattle SuperSonics are tired of the character question.

One defeat away from being swept out of the NBA finals by the tough, experienced Chicago Bulls, the talented Sonics are being asked all over again whether they have what it takes mentally in a championship series, in view of their relative inexperience and recent history of underachievement.

"I really think that's a pressured, unfair pressure question," coach George Karl said at practice a day before Game 4. "This team's proven itself. I have all the belief in the world it's going to perform."

Karl pointed out that after being upset in the first playoff round the past two seasons, his Sonics travelled a tough road to the finals this year, surviving a scare against the Sacramento Kings, sweeping the defending champion Houston Rockets and grinding out a seven-game win over the Utah Jazz.

"This team is playing in the finals, and it's got here through a nightmare of Sacramento, a nightmare of two years, coming back against Utah when there was all types of criticism, bearing a championship team in Houston."

"What else do you want? What else do you want?" Karl asked.

"My team played a bad basketball game in Game 3," he admitted. "Unfortunately, our bad game came on our home-court in a must-win situation."

"But it's ludicrous (to question their character). We fought in Chicago with a tremendous amount of heart and guts."

Seattle's main man, Shawn Kemp, said dismissively: "Anytime that you lose ballgames at playoff time people are always going to come up with stories, they're always going to come up with something negative."

Kemp became a little testy

Seattle SuperSonics' forward Shawn Kemp talks to reporters about his team's chances in the NBA finals prior to practice in Seattle, June 11. The SuperSonics trail the Chicago Bulls 3-0 in the best-of-seven series. (Reuters photo) when asked if he was prepared to assume the burden of "a true superstar" — putting his team on his back and carrying them.

"A true superstar is a player who goes out and plays to win," said Kemp.

"You don't see Michael Jordan putting his team on his back and scoring a hundred points every game. There's other guys over there playing. I don't know what you see, but I see it different, huddy."

Even the easy-going Sam Perkins came as close as he gets to impatience when asked if he was tired of the way Jordan's Bulls had seemingly "already" been "anointed" as champions.

"It's not that I'm tired of it," said Perkins. "I have to be here. I have to get through it."

Karl said he was considering starting Perkins, who already plays the bulk of Seattle's minutes at centre, instead of Ervin Johnson.

Karl admitted Johnson and backup swingman Vincent Askew are unhappy with their decreased playing time. "Vinnie and Ravin are both feeling that kind of mentality," he said.

But Kemp and guard Gary Payton denied any problem. "This is ridiculous, everybody's fine," said Payton. "Nobody's upset about nothing."

"Those are just rumours," said Kemp. "I've heard about that stuff. I've talked to them guys. None of them guys have said anything. Vincent hasn't said anything. Ervin hasn't said anything."

While resending the questions about their own maturity, the Sonics agreed that the Bulls' toughness is unmistakable.

"Chicago is playing a 48-minute mentality that we have not seen over the past year," said Karl.

"They all seem to have that mental toughness that you need," said veteran guard Hersey Hawkins, who was forced to softly protest: "I don't think we're immature."

Karl admitted that if he had it all to do over again he would make a greater effort to protect his players from certain distractions in the finals.

"You go into practice and it just seems sometimes everybody's thinking about something else — where we're going afterwards, what's happening before, what are we doing tonight."

"Because of my superstition I didn't prepare for this round until we won Utah," said the first-time finals coach.

Karl chided the press for emphasising personal statistics and rapped the league's marketers for pushing the flashy aspects of the NBA game.

"As coaches we don't even understand what you're writing about half the time," he told reporters.

"We know what the guts of success are. And sometimes you get to it but... The marketing people have no clue about the guts."

"All they want are slam dunks, blocked shots, behind-the-back passes. The one thing good about Dennis Rodman, he is bringing attention to a game that is dirty and tough and workmanlike."

That is the kind of game he expects from his Sonics tonight. "Tomorrow night will be a huge challenge to our pride," said Karl.

"Tomorrow is the biggest pride game," echoed Payton.

Muster, Becker through at Queens

LONDON (AFP) — Top seed Thomas Muster and Boris Becker reached the third round of the Artois Tournament at Queen's Club here on Tuesday, but Muster had to fight to edge Guillaume Raoux of France in three sets.

The Austrian clay court specialist eventually came through 6-7 (5/7), 7-5, 7-6 (7/2), while Becker sailed past south African Chris Haggard in straight sets, 6-4, 6-2.

Earlier, Frenchman Guy Forget put aside a confrontation with an umpire to reach the second round by beating Chris Wilkinson of Britain 6-2 7-6 (7/1).

Ninth-seeded Forget, who beat Boris Becker before losing to Pete Sampras in last year's final, dominated the first before Wilkinson, ranked 136 in the world, fought back to have two set points at 5-4 in the second, only to squander them and lose on the tiebreak.

At one point in the second set, Forget became angry with the umpire after Wilkinson was awarded the point when the Briton appeared to have illegally scooped a shot over the net.

Forget spent several minutes miming a replay of the incident as he sat on his chair between games.

"I thought it was one continuous movement and the shot was good," was Wilkinson's verdict. In a first round encounter, Tim Henman, Britain's number one, defeated Argentina's 16th seed Javier Frana 6-7 6-4.

Australians Wayne Arthurs and Michael Tebbutt saw their interest in the tournament end when they went out to Martin Damm of the Czech Republic and David Wheaton of the United States.

Major League Baseball

Bullett leads Cubs past Phillies

PHILADELPHIA (R) — Scott Bullitt went 5-for-5 with a homer and four RBI and Mike Campbell allowed two runs over seven innings in his first start of the season to lead the Chicago Cubs to a 9-2 rout of the struggling Philadelphia Phillies Tuesday.

Bullitt ignited a three-run first inning with a RBI single, added another in the fifth and hit a two-run homer in the sixth to give the Cubs a 9-2 lead. He entered the game hitting .222 (6-for-27) but saw his average rocket to .344.

"I was in one of those zones," Bullitt said. "Every pitch that was coming, I was right on it. I think they could have thrown a golf ball and I would have hit it."

Campbell (1-0) gave up five hits, walked one and struck out five. Jim Bullinger retired the final six batters.

The Cubs extended their win streak to four and have won 10 of their last 11 meetings with the Phils, who have dropped six in a row, scoring just seven runs in their last five games.

In San Francisco, Nelson Liriano's two-run triple capped a five-run sixth inning and Denny Neagle allowed two runs over 5 2/3 innings to lift the Pittsburgh Pirates past the Giants, 7-2, completing a 7-1 west coast road trip.

The Pirates went 2-0 against the Giants, 3-0 against the San Diego Padres and 2-1 against the Los Angeles Dodgers on their current western swing.

The Pirates entered the sixth trailing 2-0 against Giants starter oswaldo fernandez (3-6), but rallied for five runs. Liriano's triple off reliever Jose Bautista capped the outburst to stake Pittsburgh to a 5-2 advantage. In Montreal, Dave Silvestri's RBI single capped a seventh-inning rally as the Expos snapped a three-game slide with a 3-2 win over the Florida Marlins.

Trailing 2-1 entering the seventh, the Expos pushed across a pair of runs against Marlins starter Kevin Brown (4-5). Darrin Fletcher scored on a throwing error by second baseman Ralph Millard to tie the game and Silvestri delivered a single to right, bringing home the winning run.

Tim Scott (2-1) retired the final batter in the seventh to notch the victory.

In New York, Tony Graffanino's sacrifice fly in the top of the 13th inning scored Chipper Jones to lift the Atlanta Braves to a 4-3 victory over the Mets.

Pedro Borbon (1-0) struck out two over 1 1/3 scoreless innings for the win and rookie Terrell Wade retired all three batters he faced in the 13th for his first career save.

New York rallied for a 3-2 lead in the seventh when Lance Johnson's Major-League leading 10th triple sent home time bogar. Atlanta tied it on a Jones sacrifice fly that sent home Marquis Gissom.

Paul Byrd, (0-1), pitched the last two innings for the loss.

At Colorado, Trenidad Hubbard singled in Walt Weiss to snap an eighth-inning tie to boost the Rockies to a 7-5 victory over the Houston Astros.

Anthony Young (2-3) left in the eighth with runners on first and second and Hubbard greeted Xavier Hernandez with a single up the middle for the go-ahead run.

Reliever Garvin Alston (1-0) retired the last two batters in the eighth for the win.

The Astros had tied the game at 5-5 with three runs in the seventh, sparked by Bill Spiers's two-run homer off Rockies starter Kevin Ritz.

In Los Angeles, Donovan Osborne allowed one run in 7 2/3 innings and he and Brian Jordan drove in two runs apiece to lead the St. Louis Cardinals to a 6-3 win over the Dodgers.

Osborne (5-3) scattered nine hits, striking out three without a walk.

After the Dodgers pulled within 2-1 on an RBI single by Raul Mondesi in the bottom of the fourth, the Cards rebounded with runs in the fifth and sixth and two in the seventh.

Osborne helped his cause with an RBI double for a 4-1 lead. Gaetti went 4-for-5 with a RBI single and Jordan had two hits for St. Louis.

In San Diego, rookie Chad Mottola hit a two-run homer in the fourth inning and Kevin Jarvis allowed one run over 5 2/3 innings as the Cincinnati Reds beat the slumping Padres 4-1.

The Reds scored two runs in the third off starter Fernando Valenzuela (3-4) when Joe Oliver doubled home Taubensee and Eric Owens lofted a sacrifice fly to score Oliver. Cincinnati made it 4-0 in the fourth when Mottola's two-run shot off Valenzuela sailed over the centre-field wall.

Tony Gwynn had three hits, including a solo homer, for the Padres, losers of five in a row and eight of their last nine games.

Boston cools streaking

White Sox Mike Stanley capped a seven-run seventh inning with a three-run homer and Vaughn Eschelman allowed one earned run over seven innings as the Boston Red Sox cooled off the streaking White Sox with a 9-2 victory Tuesday.

The White Sox, who entered the game tied with Cleveland for the Central Division lead, saw a 10-game home winning streak end with only their fourth loss in 23 games.

Leading 1-0 after six, the Red Sox put the game away by roughing up White Sox starter Joe Magrane (1-3) and two relievers for seven runs the following inning.

Jeff Frye had an RBI single, John Valentin followed with an RBI double, Jose Canseco singled home two runs and Stanley deposited Bill Simas' 2-1 pitch over the left-centre field wall for his seventh homer and an 8-2 lead.

Tim Lincecum gave the Red Sox a 9-2 bulge with his 11th homer in the ninth to increase his batting average to .344.

"Naehring is a very solid player for us," said Boston Manager Terry Kennedy. "He hit a big home run and made two huge defensive plays against (Frank) Thomas. Things like that get this team pumped up."

Eschelman (2-2), who also beat the White Sox five days ago, allowed six hits. "The big key for them was that eschelman threw very well," White Sox manager Terry Bevington said.

In Cleveland, Manny Ramirez lifted a sacrifice fly with the bases loaded in the bottom of the 13th inning to score Albert Belle with the winning run as the Indians rallied for a 6-5 victory over the Oakland Athletics.

Chad Ogea (3-0), the Indians' seventh pitcher, worked a scoreless inning for the win, Cleveland's first in 19 games when trailing after eight innings.

Oakland took a 5-4 lead into the ninth, but Eddie Murray's sac fly with the bases loaded plated Julio Franco with the tying run. Murray collected three RBI to move past Carl Yastrzemski into sole possession of ninth place on the all-time list with 1,846.

At Minnesota, Dan Wilson had a five hits to pace a team-record 24-hit attack as the Seattle Mariners beat the Minnesota Twins 18-8, spoiling Rick Aguilar's return.

Wilson had two hits in Seattle's six-run fourth inning and had three RBI and two runs scored as he went 5-for-6 to raise his batting average to .316.

Alex Rodriguez and Joey Cora each had four hits and scored three runs for the Mariners.

Aguilar, who was activated from the disabled list Monday, was tagged for 10 runs and 10 hits in three-plus innings. Boh Wells (6-1) got the win despite giving up five runs.

In Detroit, Cal Ripken homered and drove in three runs and Rafael Palmeiro, Brady Anderson and Manny Alexander each had two-run singles as the Baltimore Orioles snapped a four-game losing streak with a 12-9 victory over the Tigers.

Rocky Copping (1-0) won his major-league debut, allowing four earned runs and seven hits in five innings.

The Tigers jumped to a 2-0 lead, but the Orioles struck for five runs in the third off starter Felipe Lira (3-6), sparked by Chris Hoiles' 10th homer.

In Toronto, Tino Martinez and Mariano Duncan homered and Andy Pettitte became the second 10-game winner in the American League as the New York Yankees continued their recent dominance of the Blue Jays with a 6-4 victory.

Pettitte (10-3) allowed four runs and eight hits over 6-2/3 innings, joining Cleveland's Charles Nagy in the 10-victory club. John Weteland pitched a perfect ninth for his 16th save as the Yanks beat the Jays for the 16th time in their last 17 meetings.

In Kansas City, Jorge Fábregas had three hits and Chuck McEroy won for the second time in as many games as the California Angels rallied from a four-run deficit to beat the Royals 11-9.

Fábregas went 3-for-4 with a walk and had an RBI single in the fourth inning for the Angels, who erased a 6-2 deficit with a four-run fifth and a three-run seventh.

McEroy (2-0) allowed two hits in 1 2/3 innings for the win. Jim Abbott started for the Angels, whose fifth-inning rally enabled him to avoid his 10th loss.

At Texas, John Jaha had four hits and drove in four runs and Dave Nilsson added two hits and three RBI to power the Milwaukee Brewers to a 14-4 thumping of the Rangers.

Ben McDonald (6-3) allowed four runs and 12 hits over 5 2/3 innings for the win.

Ken Hill (7-5) was ripped for nine runs and eight hits in 3 2/3 innings as the Brewers erupted for 20 hits off four Texas pitchers.

Romania face Bulgaria today

Jordanescu delays decision on showdown

NEWCASTLE (AFP) — Romania coach Anghel Iordanescu, the target of heavy criticism, is delaying deciding his team for their crucial tie against Bulgaria here Thursday.

Iordanescu, whose side fell 1-0 to France following a keeper error, has had abuse heaped on him by the ever-demanding Romanian press corps following his team's fortune.

He has been upset by claims that, he and his team is too old and clearly beyond it.

"I don't know what you hope to achieve by saying I am useless and that the team is old and past its sell-by-date. That's rubbish. I don't have to prove myself — my conscience is clear and I can sleep at night," he fumed.

The Romanian media are demanding keeper Bogdan Stelea be axed, after he miscalculated and raced off his line in the opener against France only to look back and see Christophe Dugarry's looping header sail into the empty net.

But Iordanescu refuses to be steamrollered.

"I'll weigh everything up in the next two days but Stelea has had a lot of good games and contributed to us being here in the first place," said Iordanescu.

"He felt very guilty for that mistake, very responsible, and he has taken it very badly. But I'm sure it will be his last. He is working so very hard and he has the professional solidarity of his teammates behind him."

Against France, Romania showed little of the excitement and flair which made them such a hit on their run to the 1994 World Cup quarter-final, but Iordanescu remained optimistic.

"The match against Bulgaria will be vital but we can win it and we can still qualify," he said.

Striker Florin Raducioiu, who is to play for West Ham next season, looked unfit and had to be taken off at half-time against France which must surely cause concern for Iordanescu.

But veteran playmaker Gheorghe Hagi remains convinced Romania can still make the quarter-finals.

"I think we are one of the best teams in the tournament. We must beat Bulgaria and I believe we can," said Hagi.

Meanwhile the Bulgarian squad will be staying Wednesday and Thursday nights in a Newcastle hotel. They will also possibly move into a hotel at Newton Aycliffe south of Newcastle when the Romanians move out to prepare for their last group match at Leeds.

But coach Dimitar Penev has not yet decided whether to leave their base at Scarborough after the players complained of being bored in the quiet seaside town — the players only had golf, table tennis and snooker to keep them occupied.

Bobby Mikhailov, the reading keeper, said the general mood was the players would be more happier to stay in the more vibrant Newcastle.

Bulgarians marked their run to the 1994 World Cup semi-final with well-documented drinking, smoking and partying, flying in the face of traditional sports science, perhaps explaining their desire for a livelier town.

Vlaovic's moment of magic gives Croatia victory

NOTTINGHAM (R) — A stunning solo goal by substitute Goran Vlaovic four minutes from time gave Croatia a 1-0 win over Turkey in a disappointing Group D game which completed the first series of matches in Euro 96 Tuesday.

Vlaovic, who replaced the bandaged Alen Boksic after 73 minutes, picked up the ball in his own half, out-paced the chasing defenders and after running fully 50 metres rounded goalkeeper Rustu Recber for the winner.

It was his fifth goal in only his eighth international and was the only memorable moment of a game which had flashes of individual skill from both teams but was largely a disappointing spectacle on a cold, rainy night in a half-filled ground.

Croatia had far more of the play and looked the more likely to score. But they rarely penetrated a Turkish defence which always seemed to have men behind the ball.

Croatia had three chances to score from back-post headers but Mario Stanic, Zvonimir Boban and Davor Suker all missed out.

Turkey, who like Croatia were playing in the European Championship finals for the first time, created a number of half chances of their own but left striker Hakan Sukur isolated in attack for long periods.

Too often when they broke out of defence they wasted their advantage with a succession of poor final passes. Turkey, urged on by the vociferous support of around 15,000 fans in the 22,000-capacity stadium, made a bright start and Seren Yalcin tried his luck with a long-range shot after 11 minutes.

The Turks, with Abdullah Ercan and skipper Ogun Temizkanoglu showing invention, also played some nice football in midfield, but their attacks petered out to the final third, allowing Croatia to launch several counter-offensives.

But with two defenders on Zvonimir Boban, one of their main playmakers who had a largely ineffectual game before going off after 57 minutes, the Croats intended to play the long ball forward — and their attacks also came to nothing.

Apart from the goal, the one exception came in the 67th minute when Robert Prosinecki and Robert Jarni worked an intelligent free kick on the left. Jarni's far-post cross found Suker whose close-range header somehow hounded wide of a gaping goal.

The winning goal also came on the counter-attack, almost directly from a Turkish corner.

The game did little to dispel the feeling that at 80-1, Turkey had little chance of advancing to the quarter-finals, although they have some good technique and look one of the fittest sides in the competition.

Croatia, tipped as tournament dark horses, will need to improve on this poor performance in their next match, against defending champions Denmark at Sheffield on Sunday if they are to be taken as realistic, potential champions.

Euro '96

Germany and Italy become firm favourites for final

LONDON (AFP) — Rock solid Germany and lethal Italy are firm favourites to meet in the Euro 96 final at Wembley on June 30 after their convincing opening wins this week.

While most teams had to settle with draws, the two powerhouses of European football immediately took the pressure off themselves by winning first time out.

Germany beat Czech Republic 2-0 but paid a high price for their efforts. Goals from Andreas Moeller and Christian Ziege earned the victory but the injured Jurgen Kohler will play no more part in the tournament.

Italy beat Russia 2-1, striker Pierluigi Casiraghi twice slicing the Russian defence like a sledgehammer. And the team escaped injury free.

"They were really solid," remarked German striker Oliver Bierhoff, who plays in Italy for Serie A club Udinese.

So were Germany in their destruction of Czech Republic.

The two performances were by far the most impressive of the tournament to date. All teams have played one match a piece and most of them have plenty of work to do if they hope to halt the German-Italy rush towards Wembley.

Holland, one of the pre-championship favourites, could do nothing more than finish with a goalless draw against lowly Scotland.

Although Swedish referee Leif Sundell missed a blatant handball by Scottish midfielder John Collins in the sixth minute which would have given Holland a penalty, the reality is that the Dutch, despite all their chance, could not get the ball in the back of the net.

In fact, most of the teams have been having trouble scoring.

After eight matches only 13 goals have been scored — a miserable tally which simply underlines the lack of real strikers suffered by most teams.

But if goals have been a rare commodity, yellow and red cards have been flashing with almost obscene regularity as the men in black take UEFA's get tough stance to the limit.

With over six cards a game, some teams risk not being able to field eleven players in the later stages of the tournament if the referees do not ease up.

Under the championship rules, a second yellow card means a one-match suspension.

Italy only picked up two yellow cards against Russia — Demetrio Albertini and Roberto Donadoni. But Germany are in deep trouble — collecting six against Czechoslovakia.

But Vogts has no intention of changing his side's uncompromising style of play.

"We will continue to play in the same way. If we hold back in a match, we'll have no chance of making the second round," said Vogts.

Euro 96 outsiders Croatia remain mere dark horses after their uninspiring 1-0 win over Turkey. They did little to show they could prove a threat to either Germany or Italy.

The strongest spoiler in the pack is Bulgaria and their brilliant striker Hristo Stoichkov. The Parma player is never better when he is sounding off, complaining about everyone and everything.

Since the tournament began, he has been in fine voice, managing to get himself booked against Spain after telling Italian referee Piero Ceccarini once too often his impressions on his performance to date.

It was classic Stoichkov and so were his two goals in the match. Defending champions Denmark stretched out a 1-1 draw with Portugal and although they should at least reach the quarter-finals, they have done nothing to show that they will become the first team in championship history to defend their title.

England are too busy denying the latest drunken orgy allegations to be considered serious contenders while France, although convincing enough against Romania, are looking more towards the 1998 world cup.

Villeneuve makes emotional appearance

MONTREAL (R) — Jacques Villeneuve makes an emotional appearance on the circuit named after his late father Gilles in Sunday's Canadian Grand Prix as he seeks his second win of his debut season.

Villeneuve recorded his first Formula One victory in last month's European Grand Prix at the Nurburgring in Germany.

He then finished second in the Spanish Grand Prix two weeks ago and currently lies joint second in the title chase, just 17 points behind Williams' team mate Damon Hill of Britain.

"Montreal is going to be a little bit crazy with the Canadian fans," said Villeneuve, whose father won the race in a Ferrari in 1978.

"But for sure it is going to be a lot of fun if everything goes right."

Hill's best performance here came two years ago when he finished second but he remains hopeful that he can withstand the challenge of a resurgent Michael Schumacher.

Defending champion Schumacher celebrated his first victory for the Ferrari team in the rain-drenched Spanish Grand Prix in Barcelona and said later he was hopeful of retaining his title.

"The world championship is open again," he said. "Usually I am a realist, now I feel more of an optimist."

Hill is also optimistic.

"The circuit is okay, although it is not one of the great tracks," he said. "But the racing is good there, especially with the change that has created the long straight and a good overtaking opportunity."

"There is always a good crowd in Montreal, they love their motor sport, and Jacques being there will add to that."

Palestinian council postpones session in dispute with Israel

NABLUS (Agencies) — The Palestinian legislative council postponed a planned session on the West Bank on Wednesday after deputies from the Gaza Strip were prevented from leaving the territory because they refused to submit to Israeli security checks, officials said.

Ahmad Qouria, the council's speaker, strongly protested what he said was an Israeli attempt to "hinder the work of the legislative council" and said the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) had demanded a meeting later the same day with Israeli officials to discuss the standoff.

Palestinian President Yasser Arafat was already in Nablus for what was to have been the council's first session in this northern West Bank city since it was elected in January.

Twenty Gaza deputies to the 88-member council have refused since Monday to submit to Israeli security checks at the Erez crossing from the Strip into Israel, saying they had not been subjected to such measures in the past.

The army insisted that the deputies pass through metal detectors and open their bags for inspection.

Israeli army spokesman

Shlomo Dror denied that the demands represented exceptional measures. "It's the same checking they have gone through in the past," he said.

Mr. Dror confirmed the deputies' right to travel to the West Bank, but said that until an agreement is reached on opening up a "safe passage" route from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank, "they have to go through the security check."

"We have no intention of stopping the checks," he said.

Palestinian and Israeli officials have been negotiating for weeks on the safe passage agreement, and Palestinian officials said a protocol agreement was expected next week.

Mr. Qouria, complained angrily over the Israeli intransigence.

"Our deputies were elected by the Palestinian people... and Israel is not giving them the treatment they deserve," he said. "We will not accept such actions."

The legislature was scheduled to debate the policy programme submitted by Arafat's self-rule council last month and hold a vote of confidence in the government.

The Gaza Strip has 34 deputies in the legislative council elected in January, but 14 of them were already outside the territory, council members said.

"We are protesting at the Israeli authorities' obstruction of the arrival of 22 legislators and to show solidarity with our colleagues," Deputy Speaker Mitri Abu Aita told Reuters in Nablus. "The eighth session will not be held today."

It was unclear whether the legislature would meet on Thursday. It normally meets on Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Israel has toughened travel regulations between the West Bank and Gaza Strip through its territory since a spate of militant suicide bombings in February and March in which 59 people were killed.

But Palestinians said the regulations did not include subjecting legislators to humiliating searches. Legislators said they would not accept Israeli security checks.

"It is unacceptable that the legislative council members who represent the dignity of the Palestinian people be subjected to such treatment," said Nahed Al Rayes, another deputy speaker.

Gaza rights activist sees frame-up, fears for his life

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (AP) — A leading Palestinian critic of Yasser Arafat wrote in a note smuggled out of his jail cell that he is being framed on a drug charge and that he fears for his life, human rights activists said Wednesday.

"I have been subjected to beatings," read the handwritten note signed by the activist, Eyad Sarraj. "They are trying to set me up on a drug charge. I feel my life is in danger. Rescue me. The situation is dangerous."

A copy of the note was shown to the Associated Press by human rights activists who requested anonymity for fear of retaliation.

Dr. Sarraj, a Palestinian human rights activist, has been held without charges since Sunday night, his third arrest in six months.

Palestinian police claimed illegal drugs were found during a search of Dr. Sarraj's office Monday.

Dr. Sarraj's lawyers said they believe the drugs, apparently a chunk of hashish the size of a cigarette pack, were planted to find a reason to hold their client. During the raid, police seized documents, tapes and files.

Palestinian Attorney General Khaled Kidra said charges were to be filed against Dr. Sarraj Wednesday and that he expected Dr. Sarraj's detention to be extended by 15 more days.

Dr. Sarraj's lawyer, Raji Sourani, said that Mr. Kidra's office has not allowed him to see his client or informed him when or where he would appear in court.

Dr. Sarraj heads the Palestinian Independent Commission for Citizens Rights. He was first arrested May 18 and held for nine days after he called Arafat's regime corrupt and dictatorial. He told the New York Times in an interview that Palestinian police made arbitrary arrests and tortured detainees.

Dr. Sarraj, a psychologist and the head of a mental health centre in Gaza, renewed his criticism of the Palestinian National Authority's human rights record after he was released in May.

Mr. Kidra on Wednesday criticised the intensive media coverage of the Sarraj case.

"Why do you make such a big fuss about a criminal who had drugs in his possession?" Mr. Kidra told a reporter Wednesday.

Human Rights Watch/Middle East, a U.S.-based group, protested Tuesday the arrest of Dr. Sarraj. Human Rights Watch said that no charges had been filed against Dr. Sarraj and called for his immediate release.

Dr. Sarraj's third arrest in six months and the detention of other critics of the government "casts serious doubt on the Palestinian National Authority's commitment to fundamental human rights, including the right to free expression," the group said in a statement.

Eitan may be denied sensitive post because he faces indictment

TEL AVIV (Agencies) — Israel's attorney general is considering barring far-right politician Rafael Eitan from obtaining the internal security minister's job in Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu's new government, Israeli media reported Wednesday.

Attorney-general Michael Ben Yair informed Mr. Netanyahu earlier this week that Mr. Eitan, a former army chief of staff and head of the far-right Tsomet party, could not hold any ministerial posts linked to intelligence gathering because he faces indictment for illegal use of military documents, Israel Radio said.

Mr. Ben Yair's office declined to comment on the reports, which also appeared in Israeli newspapers Wednesday.

Officials in Mr. Netanyahu's Likud Party said Mr. Eitan had been offered the post of internal security minister and the agriculture portfolio in the new government after Mr. Netanyahu rebuffed his demands to be defence minister.

Mr. Eitan is accused of illegally using a military data bank in 1994 to obtain the army records of a Tsomet militant he was trying to expel from the party.

Mr. Ben Yair's office said no decision had been made about indicting Mr. Eitan. But the media reports said the attorney-general wanted to prevent the former army chief from controlling a ministry that has access to sensitive data banks, such as the internal security portfolio which controls the police.

Mr. Eitan joined in an electoral alliance with Likud for the May 29 elections, agreeing not to run against Mr. Netanyahu and Labour incumbent Shimon Peres for the prime minister's position in the new government. His Tsomet party also obtained five seats in parliament among the 32 won by the Likud alliance.

Earlier this week Mr. Ben Yair also informed Mr. Netanyahu of plans to indict Ehud Olmert, the mayor of Jerusalem and a senior Likud official, in connection with illegal party financing during the 1993 election campaign.

Mr. Olmert was Likud treasurer at the time. If indicted, Mr. Olmert could not serve in the cabinet. Israel Radio reported Wednesday that Mr. Netanyahu hoped to name Olmert to a special cabinet post in charge of Jerusalem.

Mr. Olmert denied any wrongdoing on Tuesday. "I am disappointed by the decision (to press charges) and I am sure that the attorney-general is mistaken and it will become clear," Mr. Olmert told Israel Radio.

Mr. Olmert is suspected of involvement in creating false receipts and other misdeeds during the Likud Party's election campaign eight years ago.

Mr. Olmert, currently has immunity as a member of parliament. Under Israeli rules, Mr. Olmert, as a public servant, can ask for a personal hearing with Mr. Ben Yair to argue against prosecution.

In a statement carried by the radio, Mr. Olmert maintained he did not guide, instruct or initiate any action aimed at disguising contributions to Likud.

Regent meets Possavalyuk

His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent, on Wednesday met Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Viktor Possavalyuk. The Jordan News Agency, Petra, said discussions during the meeting covered means to advance the Middle East peace process and the question of the Chechens in the Balkan region. Mr. Possavalyuk voiced his country's appreciation of Jordan's efforts to secure peace in the Middle East, Petra said. The meeting was attended by Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Khaled Madadha and the Russian ambassador to Jordan.

Arab diplomats in Israel hold coordination talks

AMMAN — Heads of the four Arab diplomatic missions in Israel held a meeting at the Jordanian embassy in Tel Aviv on Wednesday in what the Jordanian ambassador described as the first visible and tangible translation of the Middle East peace process on the diplomatic scene in the Jewish state.

Ambassador Omar Rifai said the 90-minute meeting did not come up with any definite plans and focused mainly on the issue of peace.

Mr. Rifai, in a telephone interview with the Jordan Times, described the meeting as very good and said such encounters were expected to be regularly held by the "Arab Group" in Israel.

The meeting reviewed "several issues of common interest" and the participants pledged continued cooperation among them to advance the peace process, Mr. Rifai said.

The ambassador rejected

Israeli media speculation that the meeting was prompted by the election victory of Israeli right-wing leader Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister in May 29 elections and was a "mini-summit" ahead of the June 21-23 summit of Arab leaders in Cairo.

Mr. Rifai said, however, the group, which includes ambassadors Mohammed Bassiuni of Egypt and Ahmad Id Al Judi of Mauritania and Tunisian representative Khamis Jinawi, will continue to work together "on supporting and promoting peace in the Middle East."

Morocco was the only Arab state with a diplomatic presence in Israel which did not attend the meeting and did not give immediate explanation for the absence, Agence France Presse (AFP) said.

AFF added that the Tunisian representative said the group will "coordinate with the new government in any step it will take to achieve peace."

Balkan disarmament efforts bogged down

OSLO (AFP) — The former warring parties of ex-Yugoslavia failed in Oslo on Wednesday to meet a deadline set by the Dayton peace accord on a disarmament agreement, but were expected to resume talks in the coming days.

The parties agreed to "stop the clock" in order to find a political solution to the battle over the wording of the agreement, according to the head negotiator, Norwegian General Vigleik Eide.

The parties will now continue talks at various levels, aimed at meeting a June 20 deadline, "but there will be no high negotiation meeting called," Gen. Eide said.

"I am sure that we will be able to find a solution... and that we will end up with a signing," he said. "As soon as I feel that the parties are ready to sign, we will organise a meeting," he added.

According to a source close to the negotiations, that meeting will take place in Vienna, where the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) is based.

Gen. Eide, who presided over the negotiations on behalf of the OSCE, said he would travel to Florence on Thursday to continue the talks at the international conference on Bosnia.

The Sarajevo government has blocked the signing in a row over the wording of the document, refusing to accept the Republika Srpska's demand that it be treated equally, in the introduction to the text, with Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Bosnia-Herzegovina.

"The parties agree that the arms control text should be protected so that it can still be accepted," said Gen. Eide.

All of the parties have agreed to the contents of the accord, which was hammered out in Vienna on Thursday and which will take effect immediately after it is signed.

It sets heavy weapons ceilings for Yugoslavia, Croatia and Sarajevo, with an annex fixing a 2:1 ratio for arsenals of the Muslim-Croat federation and Republika Srpska.

According to the Dayton accord, signed in Paris in December, a failure to reach a disarmament accord by Tuesday at 22:00 GMT would mean that previous ceilings set under Dayton would take effect.

However, Gen. Eide told AFP that this is not applicable, as the terms of the accord had been agreed upon. The parties "have agreed on the ceilings" and "the text is just frozen," he said. Sarajevo claims that the two Bosnian sub-entities — the Muslim-Croat federation and the Republika Srpska — should be attached to Bosnia and not granted equal status with the state of Bosnia that it represents until the elections.

The Sarajevo government fears that doing so would kickstart diplomatic recognition of the Bosnian Serbs.

At the crux of the debate is the fact that Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Croatia are the three signatories of the Dayton peace accord, but in annex 1h of the accord, under which the disarmament agreement was concluded, all five parties are stated as being on equal footing. Gen. Eide refused to call Wednesday's failure to sign a collapse. "It's almost a success, but we didn't crown it with a signature," he said.

Court overturns conviction in 'Islamist revivalists' case

By Rana Hussein
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — The Court of Cassation has overturned a State Security Court conviction of three men on charges of illegal possession of explosives, lawyers and family members said Wednesday.

The three were part of an alleged group which involved six people, named in court documents as "Islamic revivalists."

The six were charged in the State Security Court with plotting subversion and illegal possession of explosives with the intent of using them illicitly.

But in its March 16 ruling, the State Security Court amended the charges to illegal possession of explosives without the intent of using them illegally.

The court said then it decided to amend the charges because the defendants had no past criminal record, they were married, supported families and they deserved to be "given another chance."

Defence lawyer Radi Ghareibeb said Wednesday that while the State Security Court convicted the three men for "illegal possession of explosives," the Court of Cassation ruled that since "the defendants did not intend to use the explosives and were only trying to get rid of them," they were not guilty.

The three men who were found guilty by the State Security Court in March and were sentenced to seven and a half years were Saber Tawfiq Mighel, 44, Khaled Mahmoud Rahal, 28, and Khaled Mustafa Kilani, 22.

"Justice has prevailed," Marouf Mighel, brother of Saber Mighel, said. "We knew that Saber was innocent. We had faith in the justice system that he will be acquitted."

During the six-month trial, the defendants tried to prove that they had collected the explosives to protect themselves during the Gulf war of 1991 in case that the war was over, they said, they buried the explosives to get rid of them.

The prosecution sought to prove that the explosives found with the defendants were intended to be used in terrorist attacks in Jordan.

The three other accused, who were held for one year, were acquitted by the State Security Court for lack of evidence.

Evidence against the defendants in the trial were their own testimonies, seized explosives and weapons and a copy of the 1994 law endorsing Jordan's peace treaty with Israel.

According to Mr. Ghareibeb, the three defendants, who have been held for 15 months, will stand trial at a civil court for belonging to an illegal organisation.

If convicted of the charge, the defendants face a maximum six-month prison term.

Bahrain arrests key suspect in alleged plot

MANAMA (AFP) — Bahraini authorities have announced the arrest of a key suspect in an alleged Iranian-backed plot to overthrow the government in the unrest-hit emirate.

A government spokesman told the official news agency GNA on Wednesday that security services had arrested Jaafar Ali Hussein, "the man accused who is charged with buying and bringing arms and ammunition into the country."

The suspect had confessed in front of a judge to having smuggled in eight guns and a quantity of ammunition, the spokesman said, without giving a date for Hussein's arrest.

Bahraini newspapers said Hussein, 30, lived in the Shiite Muslim village of Sanabis, west of Manama, and worked as a grocer.

He was part of a group of plotters that included seven other people involved in the last 18 months of unrest, the reports said.

He bought arms through business contacts in neighbouring Saudi Arabia. Bahrain accused Iran on June 3 of working to topple the government by financing a Shiite militant group called Bahrain-Hizbollah. Iran denied the charges, which led to ties being reduced to the level of charge d'affaires.

State television has since aired the confessions of six alleged militants.

Since December 1994 Bahrain has been hit by anti-government unrest led by Shiites demanding a restoration of parliament suspended in 1975 by the Sunni Muslim-led authorities.

Kuwait MP denies report

A Kuwaiti deputy said in remarks published on Wednesday Bahrain had made a joke out of itself by saying there was a pro-Iranian plot to topple the government.

"The presence of U.S. fleets and (military) bases in the Gulf generally, and especially in Bahrain, makes a tasteless joke of those saying there was a coup attempt," Al Ra'i Al Aam daily said in a report based on remarks by Abdul Mohsen Jamal.

"I believe there are government parties (people) behind the explosions and they are fomenting unrest to divert attention from the popular democratic demands in Bahrain," Mr. Jamal, a Shiite member of the Kuwaiti parliament's foreign affairs committee, was quoted as saying. "It is hard to confirm Iran's backing of those operations even with the confessions of the accused, since they were not sent to a fair court," Mr. Jamal said.

Jamal urged Kuwait's parliament, which has said support the Bahrainis' reform demands,

Bangladesh radio uses songs to spur voters

DHAKA (R) — Bangladesh's state radio celebrated the start of voting elections Wednesday by airing catchy songs to tell citizens to cast the ballots, a task not too familiar in the fledgling democracy. "Let us go, let us go. Let us all go to vote," said one tune. Many of the songs were folk tunes of the boatmen and farmers of the predominantly agricultural, mainly sandwiched between India and Burma. The songs, interrupted by announcements on polling procedures, asked the 56.7 million eligible voters of 120-million-strong Bangladesh to cast their ballots without fear.

Buzzard attacks, injures joggers

SOMMERHAUSEN, Germany (AFP) — An enraged buzzard attacked joggers near Wuerzburg, Bavaria, leaving two of them with injuries to the back of the head and face. The bird of prey's claw nearly took out the eyes of one 44-year-old man in a recent attack, according to Sommerhausen Mayor Gerhard Oehler, who said Wednesday that people keep a watch over the children. The buzzard, wholly protected species, may not be hunted or destroyed. Regional protection association Amden Von Lindeiner said attacks were infrequent, not unusual and had occurred before in Bavaria. He said the Sommerhausen bird was obviously a particularly nervous one, that such reactions were defence mechanism due to the raising of the buzzard young. People who can under attack were advised to protect their face with a head with a stick and to stay away from the buzzard promptly but not too hastily.

Rogue hippo terrorises Lake Victoria villagers

NAIROBI (R) — A rogue hippopotamus is chasing herdsmen and their crushing crops and spreading fear among villagers on the shores of Lake Victoria. Villagers in Kirinda, Kenya, have asked Kenya Wildlife Service to remove the hippo which terrorising them in daylight, the Kenya Times said. The hippo appears to have won the first round in the dispute over territorial rights after a local guard based near Kirinda warned farmers not to encroach on land at the edge.

China's modernisers go back to stone

BEIJING (AFP) — China's modernisation drive throwing up a bizarre paradox in northwestern regions where the authorities are encouraging local take up cave-dwelling. Estimated 40 million cave dwellers still exist in China, most of them in the country's northwestern Loess Plateau. Now a new of Chinese architects joined forces to breathe fresh air into the traditional caves and upgrade them into 21st-century dwellings with "modern" conveniences, the China Daily said Wednesday. Rising incomes have driven many cave-dwellers out of their ancestral homes to brick houses — a trend that has put a tremendous strain on China's already arable land. The cave dwellers occupy arable land, harm hillsides and make full use of solar energy.
